Mr. President, we are told that the system under which such transactions as this are possible "is well calculated to effect the object sought to be attained, namely, supplying the Navy at reasonable prices with the best articles demanded for the public service!"

Another device resorted to by nearly all of the contractors during the past year has been the false verification or summing up of the totals of class bids. This has been done in the expectation that in the hurry of opening five hundred or a thousand bids at one sitting, and the immediate award of the contracts, the aggregates set down by the contractors would be accepted as correct.

I believe this trick was successful in one or two instances, but since attention has been called to it it can deceive no longer.

It was pretended that the act of March 3, 1863, which provided that "every contract shall require the delivery of a specified quantity," would operate to the benefit of the Department, and I confess that I was once led to believe that this would be so. A leading contractor, as I have before stated, expressed the opinion in one of his publications that the adoption of this provision would obviate the necessity for any prohibition of fictitious bidding, and hence he recommended the "omission of the clause allowing the rejection of bids for nominal prices" from the act. Now, the truth is, whatever may have been the intentions of those who conceived the law and secured its passage, it has operated only for the benefit of a few contractors—those of them who have been selected by the Navy agents to make the open purchases. When the estimates are made of the ordinary and anticipated wants of the yards, only such articles and such quantities of articles will be included in that estimate and advertised for as the officer in charge of the subject supposes will be absolutely required. Now, no one can anticipate or imagine what the wants of the service may require in a time like this. New ships are built, captured, or purchased or destroyed, new depots established, the number of men in the service increased; in fact, a thousand unexpected events occur that require unanticipated supplies. As the act of 1863 only requires the delivery of the amount of articles specified in the contract, all that may be required above the amounts thus specified must be procured by the Navy agent through his trusted and favorite contractors upon open purchase, and as it would seem at his own price.

Hence it is that, as Mr. Wilson informs us, Scofield & Co. have furnished three fourths of all the open purchase supplies bought in New York during the last year; hence it is that Smith Brothers & Co. have already been paid $137,144 37 upon open-purchases made during the same period of time. How much may be still due them of reservation money or otherwise, I have no means of knowing. If the Government is thus the loser when the estimates for supplies are honestly reported to the Department, how much more will the loss be when a civil engineer or master workman at the yard who is in collusion with the contractor makes the estimates! Who can wonder that the favored contractor should be exceedingly anxious to maintain such an engineer or master workman in office with plenary powers? To be satisfied as to the operations of contractors favored by the Navy agents under this law, I again refer you to the bills of C. W. Scofield & Co., all of which were open-purchase contracts made after the passage of the act of 1863. Go to the Navy Department and examine the bills sent by the Navy agent at that yard—cap paper worth $5 per ream charged at $8; envelopes charged at $6 per thousand worth $3; 6,335 pounds of chain cable bought of the India-rubber dealer Dieterich, worth 13 cents per pound charged at 18 cents per pound—and then tell me if in your opinion the present system "is well calculated to effect the object sought to be attained, namely, supplying the Navy, at reasonable prices, with the best articles demanded for the service." I do not say that all open purchases made during the past year have been as outrageously fraudulent as those I have quoted. It is enough to show that such frauds have been perpetrated, and that they can be repeated as the law now stands.

I much regret that the pendency of the court-martial in New York, before which the contractors Scofield, Stover, Savage, and others are to be tried, precludes me from using facts within my possession, showing the modus operandi by which Navy agents, clerks, master workmen, inspectors, and other servants of the Government have been debauched by bribes, promises, and threats in order to secure the prompt payment of bills, and to induce them to receive and pay for short measure, weight, and count. Rather than trench upon the ground which I suppose is to be occupied by that court, I abstain from attempting to elucidate that branch of my subject, satisfied that all the facts will be made public before this subject shall pass from the recollection of the Senate.

The question now recurs, what is the remedy for all these evils now existing in the naval contract system? I answer, without any hesitation:

1. Moderate salaries, permanency in the tenure of office, and prompt and sure military responsibility of all supply agents. In the bill which I had the honor to submit to the Senate I proposed that the Navy agents and naval storekeepers should be naval commissioned officers. Why should they not be? If it be necessary that quartermasters and commissaries in the Army should hold permanent positions, if it be necessary that they should be held to an immediate and strict military accountability for their acts, why is it not important that officers performing similar duties in the Navy should be placed under similar conditions? Can a single substantial reason be assigned for the distinction? A dishonest quartermaster may render abortive the best matured plan of a military commander by furnishing defective transportation, clothing, or shoes. May not a Navy agent cripple the efforts of a whole fleet by furnishing adulterated oils for steam machinery, and has it not been done? In the one case, the dishonest or incompetent officer would be brought before a court-martial, tried, convicted, deprived of his commission, and otherwise punished; in the other he is permitted to go wholly "unwhipt of justice," and allowed to proceed in his career of crime.

We are told in effect by the report of the committee that naval officers are unfitted for this duty; and, as an evidence of it, it is said that Congress has sometimes been called on to relieve commanders of small vessels, who had been required to perform the duties of pursers or paymasters as well as commanders, from the liabilities they had incurred. To this the reply is:

1. Such cases seldom occur. I have no recollection of such a case since I was first connected with the Naval Committee.

2. That I know no case where Congress has ever been called to do any such thing in behalf of an officer who was educated at the Naval Academy and received the clerical education now given to officers, or who has entered the service within the last twenty-five years.

3. That there is a very wide difference between the case of an officer who commands and navigates his own ship, keeps his ship's log, pays his own men, deals out rations, clothing, small-stores and grog, keeping separate accounts of each without the assistance of a clerk, and the case of an officer of age and experience simply making purchases for Government in obedience to specific rules and instructions of the Navy Department. If it be necessary that Navy agents should be merchants, why do you not appoint merchants to those offices? Will any one be kind enough to tell me which of your Navy agents were experienced merchants before they were appointed Navy agents? Not one of them. Look at your illustrious procession of defaulting Navy agents in New York. It is urged in the report that these offices should be filled by appointees from civil life in order to popularize the Navy. Popularize the naval service by the appointment of two politicians at each yard! Let that argument, if it may be called such, be answered by the facts that I have detailed as occurring under civil appointees, popular favorites! when taken in connection with the fact that all of the medical supplies and most of the provisions and clothing for the Navy have been purchased by regular naval officers, against whom have I never heard any charge or intimation of complicity in fraud in purchasing, inspecting, or in disbursing supplies intrusted to them.

In my conviction, Mr. President, safety to the Government is to be found in the commission of the officer quite as much as in his bond. Let your public officer feel that honesty is sure to be rewarded by continuance in office and promotion, and that dishonesty will be punished by a summary court-martial, dismissal from office, and disgrace, and you will have very few if any complaints of frauds in the procurement of naval supplies. If you will not select commissioned officers to perform these duties, then I beg you to make those whom you do appoint amenable to military law for their insubordination and malfeasance. By law you now try and punish the criminal contractor. Why not try and punish the criminal Navy agent and naval storekeepers?

2. The entire abolition of all bids and contracts by classes of articles, whether such contracts be made upon advertisements or under sealed bids or in open market. I am aware that the abolition of class contracts will cause a necessary increase of the clerical force, both at the navy-yards and in the Department, and may cause some complications and inconveniences at the outset, but it will furnish an assurance of honest dealing which the present system does not afford. The bill under consideration and reported against by the Naval Committee provides—

That all laws and parts of laws requiring bids to be made in classes of articles of supply, or that require all of the articles enumerated in a class to be accepted as an entire bid, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

3. A change should be made in the method of paying for purchases made for the Navy. There is no reason in the world why this Department should not be authorized, as the War Department is and always has been, to make advance requisitions for supplies and pay. Why should a bona fide contractor be required to wait seventy days after delivery of his merchandise, which is the average time, for the payment of that which is confessedly his due? And this rule should be applied to the payment of wages. Why should all the custom-house and other officials in the cities be paid their salaries on the last day of each month and the mechanics and laborers in the yards be compelled to wait for their pay until the 12th of the following month, thus forcing many of them to suffer a discount of their certificates of wages in order to realize the money with which to pay their monthly family expenses? To secure promptitude on the part of contractors and industry and cheerfulness on the part of laborers their pay must be as prompt as it is sure.

4. What are called "open purchases," that is, the purchase of articles not included in the annual estimates, should only be made under express naval direction, should be advertised for and awarded to the lowest bidder, unless the purchasing agent and the commandant of the yard certify in writing to the Secretary of the Navy that the lowest price bid is exorbitant, and that the articles required can be more advantageously purchased otherwise than from the lowest bidder. In this way two officers will be responsible for the price, quality, and quantity of the article bought, while at present even the fact that the purchase is to be made is confined to the Navy agent and naval storekeeper. It seems to me that section six of the bill I introduced, and which was reported against by the Naval Committee of the Senate, covers this whole case. It provides—

That all articles of naval supply that can be estimated for in advance with a reasonable degree of accuracy shall be advertised for as now required by law, and obtained by contract with the lowest responsible bidder, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy. All articles of supply, the kinds and quantities of which cannot be anticipated and estimated for with reasonable accuracy, shall be procured by the disbursing and purchasing agent of the yard upon the weekly or monthly requisition of the commandant thereof, by purchase in open market. All such requisitions shall emanate from or be submitted to the proper bureau of the Navy Department and approved, except at the Pensacola and Mare Island yards; and when thus approved, such requisitions shall be returned to the commandant of the yard, who shall give notice, by advertisement in at least two public newspapers published in the vicinity of the yard, and more extensively if the Secretary of the Navy shall direct, at least ten days prior to the day of purchase, describing as accurately as may be the description of the articles of supply required, and when and where to be delivered, and the day and hour when the bids received in compliance with each advertisement will be opened. The contract for each article of supply thus bid for shall be awarded to the lowest bidder, unless the disbursing and purchasing agent, and the commandant of the yard, shall be satisfied, and shall so certify in writing to the proper bureau of the Navy Department, that the bids are unreasonable, and the articles of supply, or any of them mentioned therein, could be purchased upon more advantageous terms in open market and at private sale; in which event the Secretary may direct such purchases to be made by private contract, and without regard to the bids.

That there might be modifications of the plan I here propose that would be of advantage to the Government I do not deny, but I do believe that its adoption would be of vast advantage to the Department and save large sums of money that now, with the connivance of Navy agents, go into the pockets of dishonest contractors.

5. All dishonest transactions, all complicity with fraud on the part of any of the Government employes at the yards, should be promptly investigated before military tribunals and summarily punished. It is only by a vigorous administration and swift justice that you can prevent false estimates of the supplies needed, false reports of the amounts on hand, false measurements, false inspections, false reports of weights and quantities. At present you have no means of punishing such offenses as these either civilly or militarily. What folly to rely upon removal from office as a restraint upon crime when the guilty person would realize more money by suffering himself to be a party to one fraud than he would realize by two or three years' salary in the employment from which you eject him! Such men only laugh at your stupidity and mock at your punishment. The tenth and eleventh sections of the bill I had the honor to introduce to the Senate, and against the passage of which the Naval Committee has reported, covered this case by providing—

That if any officer, employé, or servant connected with or in the employment of the Navy Department, or any officer or agent thereof in any navy-yard or elsewhere, shall defraud, or attempt or be privy to any attempt to defraud, said Department by false count, measure, weight, quantity, or quality of naval supply, he shall, upon conviction thereof before a naval court-martial, be fined in any sum not exceeding $10,000, and be imprisoned in some penitentiary in the United States not exceeding ten years.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That if any officer, agent, master workman, inspector, storekeeper, or other person in the employment of the Navy Department, shall make a false report or estimate of the amount of supplies on hand or that may be needed at any navy-yard, with a view to defraud the Government, or to benefit any person to the injury or disadvantage of the Government, he shall, upon conviction before a naval court-martial, be fined in a sum not exceeding $5,000, and be imprisoned in some penitentiary in the United States not exceeding three years.

Can any reason be assigned why this should not be enacted into a law? The parties proposed to be subjected to trial and punishment are in the employment of the Government. It only applies to the case of those who commit or attempt to commit a palpable fraud. In the military service you would punish such an offense without hesitation by a military court-martial. Is there any reason why the same punishment should not be inflicted by the same kind of tribunal in the naval service?

6. My views as to what should be the liabilities of contractors are embodied in the ninth section of the bill I had the honor to introduce, and are as follows:

That if any contractor for naval supplies shall defraud, or attempt to defraud, the Government by false count, measure, weight, or quality of the article to be supplied, or procure, or attempt to procure, the same to be done, or shall directly or indirectly give, or offer to give, to any officer, employé, or servant of the Navy Department connected with the purchasing, inspecting, and custody of naval supplies, or to any member of the family of any such officer, employé, or servant, any bribe or present of any kind or description, for any purpose whatever, or shall offer, promise, or threaten to procure the removal, transfer, or promotion of any such officer, employé, or servant, he shall, on conviction before a naval court-martial, be imprisoned at hard labor in some penitentiary in the United States for a period not exceeding five years, and fined in a sum not exceeding $10,000.

Can any reason be given why such a provision as this should not be enacted into a law? Is it not desirable to place the servants of the Government in a perfectly independent position and beyond the reach of threats, bribes, or promises?

7. The purchasing agents of the Government should be authorized and required to employ experts to examine and analyze, if necessary, oils and other articles that are subject to adulteration or deterioration, as is provided for in the third section of the bill under consideration.

8. The duties of Navy agents and naval storekeepers should be specifically defined by law, which has never been done. If the first four sections of the bill I introduced are not such in this respect as they ought to be, modify them, change them, but let there be a written law on the subject, both for the agent's protection and for our own. The provisions incorporated into the bill were drawn after mature consideration by officers who have had the charge of the subject for many years, and upon consultation with many leading merchants in the commercial cities. If a better plan for securing the Government against loss can be devised let us have it. It is no apology for doing nothing that the plan proposed is defective.

Mr. President, we are attempting to administer the affairs of the Navy Department, with an expenditure of $140,000,000 per annum, under a system that was established for its administration when its expenses were less than $1,000,000 a year. We are trying to confine the limbs of manhood within the swaddling-clothes of infancy. The argument that the present system should be continued, because it has already existed fifty years, is a very shallow one. The officers of the Department who are familiar with the subject desire a change. They tell us that it is impossible to protect the Government against frauds so long as the present system shall be adhered to. Why will we not heed their advice?

The time has arrived when it should be thoroughly understood that our navy-yards are national establishments, to be controlled for the benefit of the nation exclusively, and not for the benefit of the neighborhoods in which they are established, or of the politicians who surround them. They cost us too much money, we have too deep an interest in them, to permit them to be surrendered to local influences.

Let me say to gentlemen representing Atlantic States, in which are our navy-yards, that we of the States remote from the seaboard are as much inclined to support and cherish the Navy as you are. We are interested in your commerce and manufactures. We want the flag that floats at the mast-head of your ships protected upon every sea, and recognized as an emblem of the power of a great nation. To do this we know that we must give of our substance, and we will give it cheerfully, if we have the assurance that naval affairs are conducted economically and wisely. We must know that the affairs of this Department are managed by the officers of the nation, acting for the common interest, and not by your officers, acting for the interest of a few contractors among you. We do not recognize the right of any man or set of men to dictate to the Government who shall be the commandant of this yard, which engineer shall be attached to that, or what shall be the regulations in another. No local political considerations can justify any such interference. We cannot consent that the Navy Department shall be administered as a "close corporation," for the benefit of a section or of individuals. I do not speak thus because of the manifestation of any such general desire on the part of the people of any section. I know that they do not feel so, but I also know that there are those, few it may be, who do entertain this sentiment, and that it is likely to increase, unless the reflecting men of your section shall rebuke and crush it.

I beg Senators to remember that the people of the great section of which I am a citizen are very slightly identified with the Navy. There are no navy-yards among them, and not one in a hundred of them ever saw a naval officer or a ship-of-war. Unless they have the assurance of economy and fidelity in its entire administration, therefore, it is the department of the public service that they will be the least likely to cheerfully tax themselves to support. Give them that assurance, and the Navy will always have, as it always has had, the unwavering support of the agricultural people of the West. Believe me, if the present condition of things be continued, let peace come, and retrenchment and economy will come with it, the Navy will be the first branch of the service to suffer, and will suffer the most. That great arm of the national defense will be punished for our infidelity to duty.

Mr. President, having assigned the reasons why I do not concur in the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs in their expression of opinion that the present system of procuring naval supplies "has operated well, and is well calculated to effect the object sought to be attained, namely, supplying the Navy at reasonable prices with the best articles demanded for the service," I leave the subject in the hands of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, before I proceed to answer some of the things suggested by the Senator from Iowa, I want to make one single remark of a general character. I agree entirely with the Senator that gross, enormous, outrageous frauds have been perpetrated upon the Navy Department and in the Navy Department; but the difference between us is radical, I think constitutional. I do not think the Senator can help thinking as he does; and I know I cannot help thinking as I do. I will read the view of the Senator. In a speech which he made in this body on the 11th of April last he gave his views as follows:

"Under the present system bids are submitted in classes. Suppose the Government wants a large quantity of various descriptions of iron. An order comes from the Navy Department to the commandant of the yard to know how much and what descriptions of iron will be needed at that yard for the next year. The commandant says to the master blacksmith, 'Fill out a schedule of these articles and a description of them.' The contractor goes to the master blacksmith, and corrupts him. He bribes him, and gets him to make a schedule certifying that he will need, for instance, a thousand pounds of one inch square iron, and ten thousand pounds of two inch square iron. The contractor thereupon bids for the largest article (i.e. the smallest amount); for instance, a quarter of a cent; for that of which the smallest amount is to be furnished he bids eight cents, the average price of iron being four cents. Having this perfect understanding with the master blacksmith, when the contractor is required to fill his contract, and to go on as they are required to do, and fill, in addition to the amount originally stipulated, in the contract, any more of that description of iron that is required, only a very small portion of this quarter cent iron will be called for, while enormous quantities of the eight cent iron will be called for. Thus the Government is defrauded. So it is in regard to lumber, and so it is in regard to every article of supply that is furnished to the Navy Department.

"Why, Mr. President, I have had an opportunity within a few days of looking into this subject. I have seen how these naval contractors, under the present system, corrupt the officers of the Government—I mean the subordinate officers of the Government; I mean the master workmen in the various navy-yards of this country—by presents and by promises."

And the Senator gave the list of the men who are thus corrupted, master blacksmiths, master painters, master carpenters, boat-makers, sail-makers, builders, &c., including every class of mechanics in the land. Those are the men that are corrupted; and to remedy that he proposes to put them all under the supervision and direction of an officer of the Navy. While the Senator believes that the great mass of the laboring people of this country are corrupt, virtue, in his mind, only exists under an epaulet; and if you can dispense with these men and substitute a naval officer in place of them, a remedy will be had!

Mr. President, permit me to say that in this respect I differ as widely from the Senator as it is possible for two men to differ on any given subject. Instead of believing that the blacksmiths, carpenters, sail-makers, and every description of mechanics—for it is as broad as that—are corrupted and bribed, and that virtue can only be restored in the administration of public affairs in the Navy by wiping them all out of place and authority, and putting them all under military control, I hold the contrary opinion.

One other remark I want to make in regard to that speech, and then I will answer the present one. In the speech which the Senator made on the 11th of April, he gave an instance of how the Government was defrauded. He said:

"Under the present system if anything is wanted at a navy-yard the Navy agent directs the contractor to procure it. For instance, there is the article of Massey's logs that are used on our ships, and which are manufactured at New York. The place where they are sold is on Broadway. They are sold there at the price of twenty dollars. When we wanted some of them the order to furnish them was given to a man by the name of Scofield, and they were furnished to the Government at the price of thirty-six dollars. The Naval Committee do not think it necessary to abolish the system under which this is done."

I have been furnished with a letter from New York on that subject which has a little curious information in it, and the facts of the case are these: the bureau heard just this story—whether they got it from the Globe, or somewhere else, I do not know; they heard that they had been imposed upon, and without consultation with anybody, or letting anybody at New York know what they were doing, they sent one of their shrewdest purchasers to convict the Navy agent of this fraud and to purchase, at private contract one of these Massey's logs, and I hold in my hand the receipted bill at which it was bought, and it was bought at forty instead of twenty dollars, as alleged by the Senator. The assumption of the Senator from Iowa follows him throughout, and to show that he does not stand alone in it I will read an extract from some evidence that has been taken before a committee of the body in which the same opinion is expressed by the acting chief of the Bureau of Ordnance:

"The Navy agents are, for the most part, ignorant of the nature of the articles to be purchased by them, and therefore entirely unfit to comply with the regulation that requires them to procure articles of proper quality, and in fact they for the most part ignore this portion of their duty; and not only this, the Navy agents are almost invariably found acting on the side of the contractor in his efforts to get poor articles accepted by the Government, and the same is true of prices: there is in this the same ignorance and recklessness, and the same identity of interest with the contractor. Here lies the great defect of the system: the interest of the Navy agent becomes linked with that of the contractor against that of the Navy Department."

That is a wholesale denunciation in direct terms by an officer of the Navy against a class of officers, general, sweeping, crushing. They are ignorant and they are corrupt, and linked with the contractors to defraud the Government, to furnish it poor articles at high prices! Mr. President, I believe there are but five of these officers now in commission, at least on the Atlantic coast. They are the Navy agents at Kittery, at Boston, at New York, at Philadelphia, and at Washington. It is my fortune to be acquainted with three of them—with two of them I am not acquainted. I will begin with the Navy agent at Kittery, Thomas L. Tullock; and I say what every citizen of New Hampshire, what every citizen of Maine that knows anything of Mr. Tullock will bear me out in saying, a more upright, conscientious, honest, faithful, vigilant officer never held a commission under this Government from the days of Washington to the present time. A Christian, who illustrates the sincerity of his faith by the purity of his life; a man of the most exemplary integrity; a man against whose reputation the breath of scandal never breathed, and was never uttered until he was subjected here on the floor of the American Senate to the denunciations which have been uttered against him. Mr. Tullock I have known for many years. You know him, Mr. President, [Mr. CLARK, President pro tempore in the chair.] I think other gentlemen on this floor know him. I take pleasure and pride in saying to the Senate that he is my friend, my personal friend, and I am proud of the honor of being allowed to call him so; and I tell you, sir, that he stands as much higher in public estimation than those who detract and decry him as it is possible in the present constitution of things for one man to stand above another.

I have read—I think it is in Æsop's Fables—that a viper once being impelled, either by the cravings of hunger or the demands of his nature, though he could make a meal of a file. He gnawed at it some time. What the effect upon his teeth was is not recorded; but I believe from that time to this the attempt of vipers to feed themselves with files has been given over. Just exactly as useless will it be for any man anywhere to undertake to build up a reputation for himself or for any Department of this Government by attacking and vilifying such men as Mr. Tullock.

The next of these officers whom I have the pleasure of knowing is Mr. E. L. Norton, the Navy agent at Charlestown. I speak in the presence of some who know him, and I aver, without the fear of contradiction from anybody that is acquainted with him, that a more upright man, a man of more sterling integrity, a man of more conscientious devotion to his duty, a man of greater purity of life, is not to be found anywhere.

The other officer whom I have the pleasure of knowing is Mr. S. P. Brown, Navy agent in this city. When Mr. Brown was first nominated for this office his nomination was referred to the committee of which I was chairman, and some charges were made, not against his character, but against his business relations, that he was then interested in some contracts. Under those circumstances the committee hesitated to recommend his confirmation. Subsequently Mr. Brown made a written communication to the committee entirely vindicating himself from this charge; and from that day to this I have never heard a word against his character until now.

Now, Mr. President, what is it that has excited this deep and bitter hostility against these Navy agents? I will tell you, sir. I have got before me, and I propose to read to the Senate, an official correspondence which will explain the secret source of this bitter, deadly hostility to Navy agents. It is, so far as these three gentlemen are concerned, because they are honest, inflexible, incorruptible men, who will not suffer the heads of bureaus to reward their political partisans at the public expense. They have incurred their hatred, and it is a compliment to them. I beg the indulgence of the Senate to be allowed to read this correspondence; it will not take long. I would send it to the Chair to be read, but I have the impression (it may be a weakness in me) that I can read quite as well as the Clerk, and I will therefore read it myself.

In the first place, I will give you an account of it so that you may understand the letters as they go along. The commandant of the Charlestown navy-yard, under orders from one of the bureaus, ordered a crank for the steamer Cambridge, of Lazelle, Perkins & Co., for which Lazelle, Perkins & Co. charged seventy cents a pound, at least seventy-five per cent. above the fair market price. The Navy agent knew that just exactly such an article as that could be bought at that time, or at any time, for less than forty cents a pound; and, as it did not come through the regular channel, was purchased without any sanction of law, when he was called upon to pay this enormous price, nearly one hundred per cent. over the market price, he refused to do it; he preferred to perform his duty to the public, and thus incurred the hate of the bureau. Let me read the correspondence. The first is a letter from Lazelle, Perkins & Co., complaining of the action of the Navy agent. This is a letter addressed by Lazelle, Perkins & Co. to Rear Admiral Joseph Smith, not because it was a matter that came under the cognizance of that bureau, but because, as the Senator says, he was in the habit of rebuking merchants and others, and it wanted a rebuker to silence Mr. Norton:

BRIDGEWATER, MASSACHUSETTS, February 9, 1864.

SIR: During last summer, Chief Engineer Wood, of the Boston navy-yard, (by order of the commandant of that station,) ordered from our forge a shaft for the United States steamer Cambridge. The shaft was made at considerable inconvenience to us by working night and day, as we were informed the steamer was required on the blockade, and were specially urged to do the work in the shortest possible time.

The shaft was made and delivered in the city of New York, and after inspection by a Government engineer the bills were sent to the commandant of the Boston yard.

After waiting several months and hearing nothing from them, the writer went to Boston January 26, and ascertained by inquiring at the commandant's office that the bills (which dated in October) were approved by him November 12, and sent to the Navy agent in Boston, and I was requested to go there, where I would doubtless find the money. I accordingly called upon him, when he informed me they were not in his possession. I insisted that he must have them, but he said no. I again told him they must be in his office, and finally, by opening a side drawer, he found them all (original, duplicate, and triplicate) duly approved. I asked him if any requisition had been drawn for the amount. He said no, and that there would not be by him; that Commodore Montgomery or Chief Engineer Wood had no business to order anything for the yard; that all orders must come through him, and if they saw fit to order they must pay for it, as he should not.

I respectfully call your attention to the above matter, that it may be brought to the notice of the proper officials in Washington, with a view that such conduct on the part of these officials (Navy agents) may be corrected; and to state further that it is my opinion, as well as that of manufacturers generally, who have had the supplying of their goods to the Department, that his conduct in this case has been caused in not giving this order to such parties as may have been selected by himself to execute the work.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

GEORGE B. STETSON,
for LAZELLE, PERKINS & CO.

Rear Admiral JOSEPH SMITH,
Chief of Bureau of Yards and Docks, Washington, D. C.

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION,
NAVY DEPARTMENT, September 10, 1863.

Commodore J. B. MONTGOMERY: Inclosed please find a copy of a report from the steamer Cambridge relating to the crank pin of that vessel; and a new one is required. You will please direct the chief engineer of the yard under your command to ascertain where it was made (which is probably at Boston, as the vessel was purchased at that port) and have a new one forwarded to her, in Admiral Lee's squadron, as quickly as possible. If you have not direct communication by steamer, the most expeditious mode will be to send it to New York, and request the commandant of that yard to forward it at once. When ready to be sent forward you will inform the Bureau of Steam Engineering.

JOHN LENTHALL.

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, February 25, 1864.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 9th instant to me was referred to the Navy agent at Boston for explanation of his long detention of your bill without action.

Inclosed I send you a copy of the Navy agent's letter on the subject to the Secretary of the Navy, which I transmit to show you how much more reasonably that agent can procure the work referred to than you seem to have charged. That, however, is no excuse for his non-action in the premises.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH SMITH,
Chief of the Bureau.

MESSRS. LAZELLE, PERKINS & CO.,
Bridgewater, Massachusetts.

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, March 7, 1864.

GENTLEMEN: I inclose a copy of explanations made by the Navy agent at Boston, touching the price you charged for the shaft for the steamer Cambridge.

Please state whether your price per pound was for the shaft finished.

You will observe that the Navy agent complains of your price as exorbitant, and if it is really so, you should of course make a deduction.

After reading the Navy agent's letter please forward to the bureau such explanations as you may think the matter requires.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOSEPH SMITH,
Chief of the Bureau.

MESSRS. LAZELLE, PERKINS & CO.,
Bridgewater, Massachusetts.

BRIDGEWATER, MASSACHUSETTS, March 11, 1864.

SIR: We beg to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 7th inclosing copy of letter from E. L. Norton, Esq., Navy agent at Boston, in which he charges us with asking your Department an exorbitant price for the crank shaft of steamer Cambridge, and says that Mr. Dearborn, of the firm of Dearborn, Robinson & Co., forged the original one at ten cents per pound, and would now make the same finished at forty cents per pound. Also, that Mr. Curtiss, of the Atlantic Works, says that forty cents at the present time would be the highest price for such a one finished, and further, that Mr. Curtiss says we are now making much larger and more difficult ones at thirty-nine cents per pound.

Mr. Curtiss must, we think, forget that we are now under contract with him to make a crank shaft, and have six months in which to do the work, and that he is to pay us fifty cents per pound for the same.

Mr. Norton further states that our establishment is at work day and night as a matter of economy, and that such establishments are run day and night. So far as our experience goes, we can assure you there is no economy in any such operation, and we beg to state that it costs much more to run day and night, comparing the expense with the amount of work turned out. We cannot turn out as much work in a night as in a day, and we are quite sure that others have had the same experience as ourselves.

We have shown you, as above, that our works are not run day and night as a matter of economy, but merely from a press of work.

If the Navy agent had considered the bill an overcharge he should have so stated it at the time our man called on him, and not say that he would not pay it for reason of its having been ordered by Commodore Montgomery instead of himself.

When the bill was rendered we considered it a just one under the circumstances; if it is not so, we stand ready to correct and refund any overcharge.

Our price for such work is fifty cents per pound finished when we have the other forgings required for the engine. We have within the past three months forged all the work for five engines of similar shape for one of our customers, and we charged him for the same twenty-five cents per pound in the rough. The crank-shaft is the most difficult piece to make of all others required in the construction of a marine engine, and there is double the risk attending its manufacture. At the present time we would not undertake to make one at the price charged your Department, (thirty cents per pound, forged weight.)

When the order was received it was stated the ship was required on the blockading station, and that we must not lose a moment's time on it.

Under these instructions we commenced it at once, laying aside other work that the wants of our customers had pressed us for delivery. When it was forged we at once put it into our largest lathe, (for which we charge twenty dollars per day,) stopping the work it was on. We cannot make these changes without incurring additional expense and loss of time.

We appeal to you, sir, if we should not receive more for this work than if we had plenty of time in which to execute it.

The parties from whom Mr. Norton obtained the prices he quotes, are competitors of ours in business, and he doubtless explained to them the nature of the case before getting their figures.

We always have been, and are now, ready to serve your Department in any way, and at quickest possible time, and ask no other compensation for so doing than what is just and right; and in this case we worked with an understanding that the services of the ship were valuable to the Government, and the first thing to be looked to was dispatch.

We leave the matter entirely in your hands, and shall cheerfully abide by any decision made in the case by yourself or the Department, and any overcharge shall be promptly remitted as you may direct.

Mr. Norton's treatment to us has not been what we should have received from a man in his capacity; we have at least a right, we think, to demand civil and courteous treatment from him as a Government officer. We mean all our claims and bills shall be at market rates; if not, we stand ready to make them so.

Awaiting your reply, we remain yours, very truly,
LAZELLE, PERKINS & CO.

Rear Admiral JOSEPH SMITH, United States Navy,
Chief of Bureau of Yards and Docks, Washington, D. C.

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, April 8, 1864.

GENTLEMEN: Yours of the 11th March I referred to the Bureau of Engineering, as it pertains to that bureau, to pay your bill for the crank made for the Cambridge.

It was a matter which did not appertain to this Bureau, but was investigated by it as stated in letter of 7th March, in reply to yours of 9th February last, and which has not escaped the observation of the investigating committee of the Senate on the subject of naval frauds.

You will please call on the Bureau of Engineering to examine and settle your bill for the crank.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOSEPH SMITH,
Chief of the Bureau.

MESSRS. LAZELLE, PERKINS & CO., Bridgewater, Mass.

Here is Mr. Norton's account of the transaction. It is a very straight one:

NAVY AGENT'S OFFICE, BOSTON, February 23, 1864.

SIR: Referring to my letter of the 20th instant, I respectfully inform the Department that I have made inquiries of the principal forgers and manufacturers of shafts such as was furnished the steamer Cambridge by Lazelle, Perkins & Co., and have ascertained that the price of the shaft, the bill of which was presented to me for payment, and which, for the reasons before stated, I declined to include in my requisition, is exorbitant.

The cost of such work at the present time is greatly above that for which it could have been furnished at the time the bill referred to was made. In no instance has the price named by the parties of whom I inquired been above forty cents per pound for the finished shaft. One manufacturer of great responsibility and experience offers to do such work at the present time for thirty-eight cents.

It will be observed that Lazelle, Perkins & Co. charge for 7,410 pounds (which is probably the gross weight of the forging) $2,445 30, and for finishing $570, total, $3,015 30.

Based upon the original shaft, and the estimated weight from the drawing, the weight of this shaft finished would be about 4,500 pounds, which, at the price offered me for such work, would amount to $1,710. It thus appears that Lazelle, Perkins & Co. have charged about $1,300 in excess of a liberal estimate for the shaft. I am informed that the manufactory of Lazelle, Perkins & Co. is usually in operation day and night, consequently the cost of the work could not have been enhanced by night labor.

As this bill will probably be presented for payment, I consider it my duty to inform the Department of the result of the inquiries I have made.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. NORTON, Navy Agent.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, February 27, 1864.

SIR: The honorable Secretary of the Navy has referred your letter to him of the 23d instant, on the subject of the shaft furnished by Lazelle, Perkins & Co., for the steamer Cambridge, to this bureau. Please state who the parties are of whom you say neither of them would have charged over forty cents per pound for the shaft in question, finished, the time they would have required to deliver it, and also who is the party who would do the work at the present time at thirty-eight cents per pound, and if these parties or either of them would furnish the shaft by working night and day at these prices.

It appears the shaft was ordered of the establishment which made the original one, to be made with all possible dispatch, and, whether the prices charged be high or not, there was no excuse for your putting the bill away without notice or report, and when asked for it saying you had it not, but after searching you found it.

If you declined to pay the bill you should at least have so reported to the commandant who approved it, with your reasons for not paying it.

Your opinion that because the works of Lazelle, Perkins & Co. are in operation day and night the work on the shaft should not be enhanced in price, is quite unreasonable, when it is known that night labor is charged at double rates at nearly all of the navy-yards and private establishments in the country.

No doubt the labor is charged at double the ordinary cost of work of that sort, for that part of it done by night work.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH SMITH,

Chief of the Bureau.

E. L. NORTON, Esq., Navy Agent, Boston, Massachusetts.

NAVY AGENT'S OFFICE, BOSTON, March 5, 1864.

SIR: In reply to the bureau's letter of the 27th ultimo, asking me to state who the parties are who would have made a shaft such as was furnished for the Cambridge, I have to reply that Mr. Dearborn, of the firm of Dearborn, Robinson & Co., says he forged the original shaft for the Cambridge at ten cents per pound, and would make the same forging at the present time for twenty cents per pound, and would have made and finished the same shaft at the time it was made by Lazelle, Perkins & Co. for thirty-five cents per pound, finished weight, and at the present time at forty cents, and would have engaged to finish it in four weeks.

Mr. Herrick, agent of the Nashua Iron Company, says at the present time he will engage to make such a shaft at thirty-eight cents per pound; but at the time it was made by Lazelle, Perkins & Co. it would not have cost as much, and that it could be finished after forging in three weeks, working only days. By working days and nights it could be done in less than two thirds that time, and would enhance the cost but very little. He should work day and night forging the shaft, as a matter of economy. Mr. Herrick says he would work nights finishing the shaft, if desirable, by charging for extra steam and lights, which he says would be but a trifle.

Mr. Curtis, agent and treasurer of the Atlantic Works, says that forty cents per pound at the present time is the highest price for such work, and that in September and October last it would have been much less. Mr. Curtis further says that Lazelle, Perkins & Co. are now making shafts, much larger and more difficult to make, at thirty-nine cents per pound. The foregoing prices are for the finished work, a close calculation of which from the original drawing makes the weight of the shaft forty two hundred pounds.

As stated in my letter of the 23d ultimo, the works of Lazelle, Perkins & Co. are in operation day and night, and as a matter of economy such establishments are run day and night for heavy forgings, and the extra expense of night labor in finishing such work is acknowledged to be "but a trifle" by those most interested.

If nearly all the navy-yards and private establishments in the country pay double for night labor, the bureau does not say that such is the practice at the works in question. On the contrary, I am informed that Messrs. Lazelle, Perkins & Co. do not pay their workmen double, or even anything extra for night labor for finishing work, and, as before stated, all forces run night and day on heavy work as a matter of economy. Therefore, instead of being unreasonable in my opinion that, because the works of Lazelle, Perkins & Co. are in operation day and night, the price of the shaft should not have been enhanced, I might have further added that the work could not have been done exclusively by day labor without a very serious inconvenience to them.

As the withholding of the bill from my requisition has been considered by the Department upon such explanation as I have been able to give, it appears unnecessary that I should say more in relation to the matter. The case may be stated briefly as follows: a requisition for a crank shaft was drawn by the authorities of the navy-yard directly and unconditionally upon me. By law and regulation it was my exclusive duty upon that requisition to have made the purchase; but it appeared from the memorandum bill of Lazelle, Perkins & Co., that some person had undertaken my function and had made the purchase.

By including that open-purchase bill in my requisition when no special authority from bureau or Department appeared for the purchase by another person, I considered that I should become a party responsible for the proper conditions of the bill. It was accordingly laid aside to await from day to day the call of the party to whom it belonged. It could not have been anticipated that two months would elapse before such call would be made, nor is it matter for surprise that I should not recall the circumstance of the reception of the bill upon the instant. It seems to me sufficient that I was unable to correct a first impression and find and deliver the bill within a five minutes' interview with the person who called.

My whole purpose and action in this matter has been governed by an earnest desire to protect the public interest by insisting upon those wholesome laws and regulations which have been devised for this purpose; and whatever difference of opinion may be entertained as to who may or may not be purchasing agents for the Department, I considered that when I called attention to an apparent exorbitant charge, I was entitled to consideration rather than reproof from the bureau.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. NORTON, Navy Agent.

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, March 7, 1864.

SIR: Your letter of explanation of the 5th instant has just been received. The bureau passed no censure for your declining to pay Lazelle, Perkins & Co. for the shaft for the Cambridge. It would rather approve your action in such cases, and trust you have always been thus scrupulous and particular in regard to exorbitant claims presented to you for payment; for the bureaus are not always the most correct judges of the proper value of purchases made without investigation. But the bureau did intend to censure you for not reporting the exorbitant price stated by you as charged for the shaft to the authority (the commandant) who approved the bill, instead of putting the bill away and waiting until the manufacturer called for his money, and then simply telling him you could not pay the bill.

It was your duty to have reported the case to the commandant when the bill came to you and you objected to it; or you should have reported it to the bureau, making the purchase forthwith.

In neglecting to do so you were, in my opinion, delinquent in your duty.

As to the cost of night work it was not for me to decide. All the reports from outside establishments to the Department in regard to hours of labor, extra time and extra pay, state that a large increase is allowed for night work and extra time.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH SMITH,

Chief of the Bureau.

E. L. NORTON, Esq., Navy Agent, Boston, Massachusetts.

This correspondence explains one of the reasons why these Departments and bureaus want to get rid of Navy agents, because they have tried to break up this practice of ordering from favorites work outside of the law for which exorbitant charges are made. I trust I have said enough about the Navy agents.

The Senator also, in enumerating those who have committed frauds upon the Navy, mentions another firm of whom I have some knowledge, and who have furnished pretty large supplies to the Navy Department. They are Trickey & Jewett. I do not know that it is necessary for me to say a word about them. I am sure it would not if Senators knew them. Mr. Jewett is a citizen of the State of Maine, unquestionably well known to the two Senators from that State, a man unimpeached and unimpeachable, of the highest repute for integrity, intelligence, and perfect uprightness in all the walks of life. He is at this moment while I speak a member of the Senate of the State of Maine. He and Mr. Trickey have furnished, as has been stated, supplies to the amount of $1,000,000 to the Department. Mr. Trickey is an inhabitant of my own city, and I hardly know how to speak of him; but I will say this: in that city of ten thousand inhabitants, it is no disparagement to any one else to say that there is no man, in point of business enterprise, of high-toned integrity, and all those characteristics that go to make up a good man, that stands ahead of Mr. Trickey; a man of high-toned integrity, great enterprise, generous to a fault, and of the most diffusive benevolence. I venture to say that within the whole range of the acquaintance of every man here, there is not a mercantile or a business house anywhere in any place or in any country that would not feel itself, at least not dishonored, but on the other hand flattered, by being set down in the same category with Messrs. Trickey & Jewett. But the difficulty with them, in the mind of the Senator from Iowa, is that they do not wear epaulets. They do not belong to that class.

But a great portion of the labor of this effort of the Senator is made upon Mr. Smith, of the firm of Smith Brothers & Co. of Boston. Let me say this of Mr. Smith: I know him; he is a merchant of the highest character; of unimpeachable integrity and unblemished reputation with all who know him. There is not a mercantile house in Boston, and that is a place, I think, where the standard of mercantile integrity is as high as it is in any city of this Union—there is not a mercantile house nor a mercantile man in Boston whose reputation excels or exceeds that of Mr. Smith. Mr. Smith is not only a man eminent in the walks of mercantile and private life, of unspotted integrity, and of unsuspected fairness, but, besides all that, he is an able man; he is a keen man as well as an honest man; and do you want to know the secret of this hostility to Mr. Smith? I have it in my hand here now.

When the report of the Secretary of the Navy communicated to the two Houses of Congress on the 7th of December last was published, Mr. Smith saw, as every man can see that will look at it, evidence of the grossest and most outrageous frauds under the published evidence of the Secretary of the Navy—not one of them perpetrated through the agency of the Navy agents. As became a man of integrity and of keen intellect, he, in a little pamphlet which I hold in my hand, exposed some of these frauds perpetrated, not through Navy agents, but through officials here at Washington. He exposed them in his pamphlet. Let me call your attention to one or two of them. He found, for instance, in the contract for sperm oil that a Mr. H. D. Stover, who has figured considerably in this matter, by some remarkable coincidence, furnished all the oil for all the navy-yards on this side of the continent, at Charlestown—there was none furnished at Kittery—at Philadelphia, at New York, and at Washington; and it was a little singular that the price varied from about $1 65 a gallon up to $2 44; at Charlestown it was $1 65, at New York $1 68, at Philadelphia $2 35, and at Washington $2 44—Stover sweeping the board. It is a little curious that Stover's bid, in every case, was within a few cents of the next highest bid. For instance, where Stover got the contract at $2 44, the next highest bid was $2 46, two cents difference, and when he got it at $1 68 the next highest bid was $1 70. So in the various instances where he got it at other prices, the price that Stover bid in no instance fell more than five cents below the next highest bid, though the difference in prices ranged from $1 65 to $2 44.

It struck the select committee on naval supplies, who had the subject before them, as exceedingly curious that one man should be gifted with such wonderful sagacity as to be enabled so to gauge his bids at four different yards at such widely different prices, and just fall a cent or two below the next highest bidder; and that astonishment was increased when, upon a critical examination of the bids and by evidence given before the committee by the clerk of the chief of bureau who executed the contract, it appeared that the bid of $1 68 a gallon for oil was originally made at $1 40, and after it was made it was raised twenty-eight cents a gallon, and was still two cents below the next highest bid. I do not know what the Senate will think about that; I do not know what the country will think; but I do not believe there is a man anywhere who can have a doubt that in some mode known only to the contractor and the bureau with which the contract was made, the bidder in that case was exactly advised of the next highest bid, so that he was enabled to put his a few cents lower in each case. Mr. Smith had the audacity to bring this to light.

There can be no doubt what verdict a jury of twelve honest men would render in such a case.

There is another contract to which I will call the attention of the Senate; it was before the Senate on another occasion, and a different solution from that which is now suggested was then attempted to be given. That is what is called the wrench contract, one of the most extraordinary contracts that ever was entered into. That was a contract by which certain articles amounting in price to $4,687 were contracted for that were in fact worth a little less than $1,600. In other words, about two hundred per cent. was put upon this contract, two hundred per cent. put into the pocket of this man Savage by a contract not made with a Navy agent, not made with a hard-handed blacksmith, or a carpenter, or a dishonest sail-maker, or any of those hardy sons of toil whose hard hands are a certificate to the honorable Senator of their dishonesty; but executed at the Navy Department, by which the Government in a transaction amounting to $4,600 was swindled and robbed out of $3,000. This was a fact which Mr. Smith brought to the attention of the public. He exhibited other facts in this pamphlet which I hold in my hand, showing that there were erroneous computations made on the face of the contracts, and on inspection it appears that there were various other frauds, such as where an article was bid for at 30 cents a figure 1 was put on the left hand, so that it was made to read $1.30; and various frauds of that kind. Mr. Smith brought these facts to light and published them, and for it he is entitled to the thanks of every man that desires purity in the administration of the Government. Instead of it he has received and secured to himself, and probably to his children after him, the undying hatred of the men whose conduct is thus implicated.

Again, Mr. Smith has not only exposed these wrongs, but he has been guilty of another gross offense in the view of the heads of these bureaus. When his attention was first called to this subject of fictitious bidding, he looked back to years ago when it went on quietly year after year, and year after year; and while the profits of that plunder went into Democratic hands not a word was said against it; but the very first year Mr. Smith's attention was called to it he did what the Senator said he ought to have done; he notified the heads of bureaus and the Secretary of the Navy of these frauds by correspondence. He had correspondence, too, with the gentleman appointed to prepare a naval code, and made a suggestion of the very frauds that had been practiced, and the mode in which they might be practiced; and for that, too, he has committed, in the eyes of these gentlemen, an unpardonable sin.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. GRIMES. Do I understand the Senator to say that Mr. Smith called attention to these fictitious bids before he himself made the fictitious bids to which I alluded?

Mr. HALE. No, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. He first availed himself of the law, as I understand it, for a year or two, and then called attention to fictitious bids.

Mr. HALE. I have said that Mr. Smith is not only an honest man but he is a keen man. I do not know that I shall be doing any injustice to the Senator from Iowa—I certainly do not mean to do any—if I say to the Senator from Iowa that he is quite as keen a man as he is, and I think he is a little keener in one respect. The Senator from Iowa—I do not mean to say anything unkind or disrespectful to him—is charged and surcharged with the concentrated venom of all the men that Mr. Smith has disturbed by writing this pamphlet, and he has been so highly charged that he let some of it off before he made his speech here, as I think the Senator will see when I read as I propose to read Mr. Smith's answer to the speech of the gentleman, made before the speech was delivered. I will read it:

WASHINGTON, May 21, 1864.

SIR: Having been summoned before the select committee of the Senate on naval supplies to give testimony concerning the naval contract system, the business transactions with Government of the house of Smith Brothers & Co., of which I am a member, my knowledge as to the evidence of fraudulent transactions, and several other subjects having relation to the above, it occurs to me that from the nature of my testimony responsive to interrogatories and its voluminous extent, the most important points will not readily be recalled by you.

I take the liberty, therefore, to address to you this communication, in the endeavor to present a clear and concise statement of these points.

It has been alleged, as though to our discredit, that our proposals contained fictitious bids. This we have always openly declared. Why were such fictitious prices inserted in our proposals? Because the system established and acted upon through many years, as appears by the reports of the Navy Department, had made such fictitious bids a necessity for successful competition; and I assert that on certain classes, such as those for which we principally bid, there would have been no probability of obtaining contracts except by fictitious bidding, according to the precedents established and published to the world by the Navy Department.

It was solely by a mathematical analysis of the said published reports, revealing to us the precedents as to high and low prices on certain articles, that we based our first bids and obtained our first naval contracts; and we embraced the earliest opportunity that occurred to protest, to the Navy Department, against the system, and express a desire for its reform.

This we did within about six months from the date of our first contracts, and before their completion. In February, 1862, we addressed the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks as follows:

"We are especially pleased at your allusion to contracts and the mode of obtaining them, for it gives us an opportunity we have desired to place on record our knowledge of the system and our experience of its practical results."

"We believe that your judgment, after long experience, must coincide with our own, namely: that the contract system, as now existing in two bureaus of the Navy Department, is essentially wrong in contracting for a continued supply of a large assortment of goods upon the lowest aggregate fractional schedule. Instead of a clearly defined contract indicating what the buyer is to receive and the seller to give during its continuance, the result is a lottery to each. Such is the system, and it is the system that is responsible for the absurdities that follow, not the merchant who approaches Government with his wares and finds this system in his way."

"Now as to the mode of obtaining contracts. We do not see, with you, that bidders 'practice deception' when they state prices 'without regard to the value of the articles.' The motive is apparent. It is, as you remark, simply 'to become the successful bidder in the aggregate.' To illustrate: how did we obtain our contracts?"

"The writer of this, who prepared our bids last June, was never in the naval apartments until in your presence the bids were opened. He had not then asked a question nor did he know an official or clerk within the gates of the navy yard. Having decided to attempt some Government contracts, we analyzed the published reports of the Department in previous years to discover the modus operandi; and, in passing, we would say we were astonished that a system that left such records of bargaining could have so long been maintained. We reduced the prices throughout from ten to twenty per cent., and entered the lists. It is for this reason that 'no schedules abound with more fictitious prices than our own.' Can the Government find fault with fictitious prices that offer goods much less than they had paid upon fictitious prices for many years?"

After quoting from the last schedules of merchandise advertised, descriptions of files which were probably never seen in this country, certainly never wanted, we said:

"The history of their origin would be an interesting subject for antiquarian labor of a contract investigating committee, as such schedules appear during successive years in the published contracts of the bureau."

"We have endeavored thus to make an exhibit of the present system of contracts, the mode of obtaining them, and their purchase results. We shall be glad to aid any effort to replace it by one more distinct in its demands upon the seller of merchandise, and therefore far more agreeable to those who would be honorable competitors for Government patronage."

An exhibit was made in this paper, also, of our deliveries of merchandise to date, at high and low prices, proving that the average had hardly equaled a fair mercantile rate of profit.

I discussed this subject again more fully in February, 1863, in a paper addressed to the honorable Secretary of the Navy, and to Hon. C. B. Sedgwick, as follows:

"The evils of the contract system of the Navy Department have existed for many years. The disadvantages that have followed to the Government have been inherent in the system itself. In two bureaus of the Department a system of proposals by advertisement has been maintained that in result was a mere matter of chance to the respective parties."

"Thus in the Bureau of Yards and Docks it has been customary to advertise for a great variety of articles, which were only to be called for if wanted. The chance, therefore, for the bidder to calculate upon is what articles will be wanted."

"In the Bureau of Construction it has been the custom to advertise for a quantity of assorted merchandise, with the stipulation that any additional amount of either kind is to be furnished during the fiscal year as may be demanded. Here the chance for the bidder to consider is what quantities will be wanted."

"Thus the schedules advertised have been no fixed criterion as to what is really to be supplied."

"If the contracts of the Department, as published for years past, be analyzed, it will be found that a system of bidding has been maintained by which the merchandise advertised has been offered to the Government at very much less than its value in the market, the bidders having calculated according to their estimate of the real wants of Government. The law has required that the lowest bid in aggregate upon the whole should be accepted."

"The merchant, therefore, who would approach Government with his offer must follow these old precedents or be entirely distanced by his competitors. Honorable mercantile houses have desired and urged a reform in the system that would place the transactions of the Department upon a more legitimate basis to all parties concerned."

"Now as to the practical results of the system. Absurd as it proves to be in its details, the record of our business proves that in the aggregate it is as likely to prove favorable to the Government as to the contractor, though a lottery to each. Government pays large prices for some articles. It receives others for mere nothing. The figures annexed are the basis of our opinion that upon the entire amount of our year's business with your bureau the average per cent. of profit will not exceed or equal a fair mercantile rate."

The Remedy.

"The bill reported by the committee is an advance toward remedying the evils of the system. In two of its provisions, however, in our judgment, it is defective:

"1. By providing (section two, line five) that there may be an increase of fifty per cent. or a decrease of twenty-five per cent. upon the quantities advertised, the game of chance is still open."

"Let the Navy Department, as the War Department, advertise for precisely what is to be received; no more, no less. There can then be no 'nominal prices.' They will disappear, for the merchant will know that the merchandise described is to be furnished."

According to my recommendation, the bill then before Congress was amended, and by the joint resolution of March 3, 1863, limiting quantities to no more and no less than those advertised, the evil of fictitious bidding was remedied; and, in agreement with my prediction, thence afterward fictitious bids disappeared."

The earliest report of the Secretary in my possession is for the year 1855-56.

Items from contracts therein are as follows: round iron, 4 cents per pound; tinable iron, 1 cent per pound; copal varnish, $3 per gallon; coach varnish, 2 cents per gallon, &c., &c., &c.

In a contract for 1856-57, large and costly files are at 1 cent per dozen.

For the Charlestown yard, American iron, common sizes of round, is at 4½ cents per pound; Russia sheet iron, 2 cents per pound.

The contracts for 1859-61 show the increase of fictitious bidding.

The following are but specimens of many items therein: Contract of Horton, Hall & Co., for Charlestown yard, with Bureau of Yards and Docks: round iron, 5 cents per pound; iron wire, 1 cent per pound; steel, 17 cents per pound; steel wire, 1 cent per pound; sperm oil, $1.40 per gallon; neat's foot oil, 10 cents per gallon.

Contract of J. L. Savage, for Gosport: half round bars, 14 inch, (worth $6,) for $10; dead smooth bastard files, 12 inch, (worth $15,) for 2 cents; three square files, 10 inch, (worth $4,) for 1 cent, &c., &c., &c. Nails, 1d. to 4d., 3½ cents per pound; nails, 4½ inch, 1 cent per pound.

In the iron contract for Charlestown: round iron is at 3½ cents per pound; flat iron, 3½ cents per pound; sheet iron, 6 cents per pound; cast steel, 18 cents per pound; blister steel, 3 cents per pound.

"The records of the bureau will show that of profitable articles under the last named contract, quantities were delivered enormously in excess of the face of the contract as advertised."

And it is further to be remarked, that while some of the prices above quoted are far more fictitious than any in our contracts, they are transmitted to the Secretary and to Congress without any reflections upon the bidders, my suggestions for reform, any comments whatever. In the report of the select committee on naval affairs and expenditures, 1859, Admiral Smith gives evidence as to a contract for railroad iron at 80 cents per ton, worth $70; other articles of iron being "double a fair price." But I find no discussion of the bad features of the contract system; not a word of argument or protest against the feature of unlimited supplies during a year which forced him to contract for railroad iron at 80 cents per ton worth $70.

Such were the extraordinary agreements entered into by citizen traders on the first part, and the Government of the "United States" "on the second part," according to law and practice, meanwhile undisturbed. Although in the case of the railroad iron a dispute occurred, and the contractor was refused settlement, yet others must have obtained settlements and secured profits on like fictitious proposals, as above quoted, or the same parties would not have continued as contractors through a period of years."

We resolved, upon the signature of our first contracts, to spare no effort for a remedy for such absurd records of transactions with the Government. In a few months we recorded our protest against it; and before the expiration of the second year accomplished a remedy as above stated.

As to the profits on contracts under such a system we remark:

First, that if the profits had been large, they would have been rightfully obtained, under contracts devised by the bureaus, and faithfully executed by ourselves.

Second, we have placed sworn testimony before your select committee that the average per cent. of profit, (offsetting gains by losses, under the old contract system,) upon contracts under the new law and upon open purchases, during three years of Government business, has not equaled the rate of profit meanwhile upon our regular business in Boston and New York as wholesale merchants."

Again, we remind you that as to the deliveries under our contracts, we have no option but to fill requisitions made upon us. Nor have we demurred as to unprofitable orders upon us, except in two cases, against which we protested, as illegitimate, and contrary to the intent of the contracts. We replied to the Chief of the Bureau of Construction thus:

"Neither the spirit nor letter of the contracts demands of us to supply material not to be wanted until the year 1863-64; or to furnish merchandise when demanded, because of its cheapness, in retaliation for other legitimate sales. The possible wants beyond the face of the contracts are a matter in which the Government and contractor take their advantage or loss, as the necessity for use may arise."

No further claim was made upon us for the requisition debated.

We are informed of a suspicion or allegation of collusion with officers; but such suspicion is not only wholly unfounded, but, even if it were not wrong, it can be shown there is no necessity for such collusion to insure large orders for certain material.

As has been stated, the annual reports supply indices of articles wanted in extra quantities; but besides, it would require slight experience to be fully informed in the matter. For instance, any party knowing the construction of a ship, is aware that rounds  $\frac{1}{2}$ , 1, and  $1\frac{1}{2}$  inch, and flats  $4\frac{1}{2}$  inch are used for bolting and strapping in enormous proportion to all other sizes; and these are kinds which of necessity Government has required.

In ignorance of the routine in navy-yards, these requisitions for iron for ships have been attributed to the master machinist, whereas they originate with the naval constructor or naval storekeeper.

In a letter of February, 1862, discussing the subject of large deliveries of profitable articles under the old or fictitious system, the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks wrote to Smith Brothers & Co.:

"For these supplies I attach no blame to you."

Again, afterwards he wrote:

"I have no complaints to make of your failure to comply promptly with all demands upon you, so far as this bureau is concerned."

After two years' additional business relations with our house, the chief wrote to the Secretary of the Navy:

"I believe the house of Smith Brothers & Co. to be of respectable standing, and that they employ no means not considered legitimate in those times to obtain orders."

He has also repeatedly in conversation admitted his opinion "that they are an honest and respectable house."

The records will prove that we have faithfully fulfilled all contracts with the Department, and that our contracts have been exceedingly advantageous to Government, owing to the great advance of merchandise during the war.

Upon our contracts of August last, amounting to about $150,000, to be completed before the 1st of July next, the advance upon the merchandise has been more than $50,000, and we have delivered largely iron at $100, when worth $150 per ton. The contracts have been faithfully fulfilled.

It is possible that two instances of sales by our house may be presented in a form to our disparagement; said sales, namely, of lead under our contract with the Bureau of Construction, and of boiler iron to the Bureau of Ordnance, having been the subjects of prolonged discussion with the bureaus. The original correspondence, which we printed in full from satisfaction with our record, will show that our claims were vindicated, the decisions of the bureaus having been overruled, while our integrity was not questioned.

In March last it was assumed that some tin we had delivered to the Bureau of Ordnance was not Banca, according to the inspector's voucher, but Revelly tin. We replied that "besides the voucher on file in the bureau, we had ample evidence of the fact that the tin was as described;" and furthermore said, "we repeat the challenge to produce any just claim against us for restitution upon sales by us of tin or other merchandise to Government." No claim has since been presented.

For the record of our integrity in all transactions with Government we appeal confidently to the very extended testimony before the Senate committee of investigation, and which we are eager should be given to the public. A complete vindication will be found therein from any and all aspersions which can be made upon us.

Especially is said evidence full and conclusive as to the suspicion of collusion or pecuniary interest with the Navy agent. Thirty-two interrogatories were presented, covering almost every possible form of suspicion, (inquiring as to relations of "consanguinity or marriage;" and irrelevantly penetrating private matters according to the decision of the committee. They were welcomed as opportunity for a full exhibit of the truth.

In December last upon request I prepared a paper for the commissioner of the naval code, suggesting means for the greater protection of public buildings, and of weights and measures in navy-yards. These suggestions were so acceptable as to be embodied in the new draft of a naval code submitted to Congress.

Subsequently, in January last, we communicated to the Secretary of the Navy an analysis of certain contracts, developing evidence of collusion, to the great wrong of Government. This exposé has occupied largely the attention of your committee.

In the Congressional Globe of May 20, the honorable Senator from Iowa is reported as saying:

"I think it will turn out that the frauds to which the Senator from New Hampshire alluded, which I suppose grew out of fictitious bidding, were not called to light, and the publication that has been referred to was not made by the firm or the member of the firm that did make it, until after he had been rebuked by the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks himself for having made fictitious bids, and been called upon to respond and to deliver over some of the articles for which those fictitious bids were made."

In this statement the honorable Senator is under mistaken impressions.

First, as to the "rebuke," as he styles it, for fictitious bids. This was discussed, as above stated, nearly two years before.

Second, as to the explanation of the bad contracts in question by fictitious bids. The honorable Senator attempted this theory on a former occasion in explanation of the wrench contract; but it is entirely inapplicable. The contracts were executed under the act of 3d March, 1863. There were no fictitious prices therein; but they vary from twice to twelve times the value of the article.

Third, as to the suggestion of the analysis, and the time when it was made.

From information I had received and which was communicated in June last to the honorable Secretary of the Navy by gentlemen of the highest respectability from Massachusetts, I anticipated that the next report of the Department would reveal some extraordinary contracts. As soon as the report appeared, wrong was detected.

But charges as serious as those in the analysis were not made without careful consideration. The evidence upon which they are based, after compilation from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, was examined in detail by a gentleman whose competent judgment of evidence would be admitted.

After the paper was placed in type, for greater distinctness the proof was submitted to a counselor of Boston, eminent for character as ability. Upon a critical examination thereof, in connection with the Secretary's report, he pronounced it a conclusive statement of evidence, sufficient to prove the allegation to any intelligent jury beyond a reasonable doubt; and furthermore with others declared it my personal duty, as a citizen, to place said paper with the Secretary of the Navy, that the serious wrong discovered might be thoroughly investigated. The unpleasant, and, as might have been expected, thankless duty, was performed.

From this last remark I must except the honorable Secretary. He alone of the officials concerned expressed his cordial appreciation of the service, remarking it was as important to the country as that rendered in the field.

In conclusion we remark that while regretting the existence of a system which compelled us to resort to fictitious bidding in order to obtain naval contracts, (until that system was changed, as we consider, principally through our instrumentality,) we know of no transaction which was not strictly just toward Government, or of any action on our part which, under the circumstances, was not fully warranted.

We hope that our efforts in behalf of reform, our fearless assertion of our rights as merchants in correspondence with heads of bureaus, and our exposure of collusion and fraud, have not stimulated an eager search for wrong on our part which has no existence in fact, and thus called down upon us an unfriendly criticism.

I remain, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

FRANKLIN W. SMITH.

HON. JOHN P. HALE,

Chairman of Senate Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. President, I have read this long communication to the Senate because I thought it due to a gentleman whose character was thus assailed, and, I think, as it will be published side by side with the statements of the Senator from Iowa, that the injurious imputations thrown upon the character of Mr. Smith will carry with them their own antidote. I believe there is no higher duty than a Senator or the Senate owes to the country, to the Government, and to itself, than to vindicate, whenever it is unjustly assailed, the character of any citizen whose conduct may be thus brought before the Senate. Neither shall I, even though the Senator from Iowa has made the astounding declaration that he is not a non-resistant, at any time be deterred from the course which I think my duty imposes upon me in defense of individual character, or in ferreting out public wrongs where ever I may believe that they exist.

In regard to this bill of the honorable Senator, I believe that in the speech which he has read today he states that the report upon it is actually the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs. A little while ago it was the report of the chairman only, and I believe, standing in his place in the Senate, he undertook to poll the committee, and asked if any of them had ever seen it before, and as none of them rose in his place he assumed that it was mine. The Committee on Naval Affairs, in the exercise of the duty which this body devolved upon them—I am not going to say that they did not show a great want of taste, of discernment, of appreciation of exalted worth and great attainments, in not putting the Senator from Iowa at the head of that committee; I waive that; it is settled for the present—but, sir, the Committee on Naval Affairs in the deliberate exercise of their unbiased judgment upon that bill came to the conclusion that it was unwise and inexpedient to pass it. In my humble judgment, it would be particularly unwise at this time, when a class of officers of unsurpassed integrity, and of most scrupulous fidelity in regard to the public interests in carefully guarding and watching the public treasure, are pounced upon by those whose hands they have endeavored to keep from the public Treasury, to pass such a sentence of condemnation against those faithful officers for the honest and faithful performance of their duty.

But, sir, in recommending to the Senate that that bill do not pass, the committee did not undertake to say, and do not say, that there may not be many suggestions in it worthy of the consideration of the Senate, and which it would be well to incorporate into the law, but they looked upon the bill in its principal feature, and that was the abolition of the very few civil officers there are in the Navy.

The honorable Senator says that we propose to "popularize the Navy." I do not know where he got that phraseology. After the most careful examination of the report that I have been able to give to it since this subject has been up, I do not find anything of the kind in it; but the report of the committee is based upon the idea that the Senator in the close of his remarks said he wanted to see carried out. He says he does not want to see the Navy made a close corporation. Neither do I. There are but two classes of officers, Navy agents and naval storekeepers, that are now appointed in the naval service from civil life. The expenses of the Navy, as given by the Senator in his speech, are $140,000,000 a year. Of course some of that, in contracts for vessels, goes outside of the Navy proper. But in regard to all its employment of officers and men they are confined to a particular service, and there are but two classes now left that are taken from civil life, to wit, Navy agents and naval storekeepers, and it is proposed by the Senator's bill to abolish them.

But, Mr. President, because there have been frauds committed, and the Naval Committee report against this change, is it fair, is it candid, is it just, is it ingenious to say that the committee are in favor of perpetuating frauds? As well might we retort upon the Senator from Iowa (taking the facts that have been disclosed in regard to contracts made at the Navy Department by which the grossest frauds that were ever perpetrated under the sun have been carried into successful execution without the intervention of any Navy agent or storekeeper) and say that he was in favor of perpetuating these very frauds and these very abuses and enlarging the sphere of their operation in the navy-yards, because he recommends the substitution of naval officers for civilians. But, sir, it would be neither candid, nor just, nor ingenious to do it. I do not believe the Senator has any such intention of any such wish.

The Senator labors under one of the strangest hallucinations that ever was allowed in the providence of God to afflict so clear an intellect as his; and that is, that all the evils that have been committed, all the wrongs that have been done, all the thefts that have been committed upon the public Treasury, would be saved, remedied, and prevented in all coming time by withdrawing from the naval service the exercise of all control except by those who wear epaulets and hold commissions: an epaulet is the sovereign remedy for all wrongs. I have as high a regard for naval officers as the Senator has. I respect them. I believe that as a class they are upon the whole as upright, as honest, and as pure as any other class; not more so. I yield that to them.

But, sir, how does this wholesale onslaught upon the mechanics of this country sound? How will it be received by the country? Who are to save this nation in this its hour of peril? Who have volunteered more readily, more earnestly, and more heartily in defense of the national life, which is this day in peril, than the hard-handed sons of toil whom it is proposed by this action in the Senate to-day to disfranchise? Pass this bill, sir, and it is in itself a standing libel published by the American Government, to be read by all nations and to go through all time as the judgment of this Senate, that the great body of the mechanics in the various walks and occupations in which they are to be found are bribed, corrupted, and have the price of this corruption in their hands to-day. I do not believe it. When that comes to be the conviction of this Senate and of this Government, or of this people, I tell you, sir, you have little left that is worth preserving. If that be the fact, it matters but little to the interests of humanity, to the progress of the race, and to the elevation of man, what is the result of this rebellion. If you believe the great body of your people are not to be trusted, if they are to be put under the control and agency of men in military power because they are corrupt; it is a sentence of condemnation and of ostracism upon that great class upon which this Government and every other Government must in its hour of emergency depend.

Whenever you do that you strike a fatal blow at the Navy. You separate it from the sympathies and the respect of the great mass of your people. You pronounce against it a sentence which will work its utter ruin. You isolate them from the masses. You make them, as the Senator from Iowa says he does not want them to be made, a close corporation, and then you will see what you have seen, and what you are now witnessing, in regard to these contracts to which I have called the attention of the Senate, on a more extended scale.

Mr. President, this is a question of no light, no trifling moment. It is radical; it looks down to the very foundations of the Government; it is searching; it goes out into all the ramifications of society; it is lasting. Enter upon this course, and you separate the Navy in fact and in deed from the great mass of the people upon whom every institution, Army, Navy, courts, and everything else, must depend.

Again, the Senator bases his action not only upon the corruption of all the mechanics in every branch that are engaged in the naval service, but he does more than that; and I believe in the speech which he has made this morning he did not make a solitary exception of every contractor that he named that he did not classify as corrupt and as intending and cooperating with bribed employees of the Government to defraud the national Treasury. Sir, the Secretary of the Navy is engaged, I understand, to-day in prosecuting these fraudulent contractors. I am glad of it. Let him go on; let him find them out; let him convict and let him punish them; but the Secretary of the Navy and everybody else must remember it generally takes two persons to make a fraudulent contract where a third party is to be defrauded; and let him get every one of these contractors inside the penitentiary or of Fort La Fayette, and the most guilty culprits will be outside then.

Now, Mr. President, what is our duty? It is not our duty, as I understand it, in this hour of danger and of peril to the country, to enter into any new and untried experiments. But so far as experience sheds any light on the path of our duty, as evils are discovered let us remedy them, and apply the remedy, and not with ruthless hands at one blow upset a system which in the main, I repeat, as I said in the report, has operated well. That there have been frauds and great frauds, and gross wrongs, I do not deny. I shall be glad to see them rectified; I shall be glad to see our legislation purged of any evils that our history demonstrates to exist. But, Mr. President, if you had the wisdom of the wisest man that ever lived, if you had a patriotism as uncalculating and unselfish as ever pulsated in the breast of man, if you had a sagacity such as no history records, if you had a wisdom to legislate little short of infinite wisdom, you could make no system of laws, you could devise no plan that can be carried into successful operation, which shall preserve your character and your Treasury, and keep yourselves intact from depredations such as these, until you find men of perfect integrity to administer them; and, sir, when you fail to find such men, when you find that there has been any dereliction in this respect, you should not look with a too superstitious reverence upon the epaulet worn upon the shoulders of a man who has committed the deed.

Mr. President, if I know myself, I desire nothing in this administration of the Navy or of anything else that does not look to the best good of this country. I have been opposed from the beginning to transactions such as I have alluded to, such as I have delineated. I was opposed to them under the Democratic Administration. I am opposed to them under this Administration. I have been opposed to them and I will continue to be opposed to them to the latest hour of my life. For this I have been denounced as an enemy to this Administration; as if denouncing fraud, falsehood, corruption, profligacy, and extravagance in the use of the public Treasury is to be opposed to this Administration! Mr. President, I desire to support this Administration with the sincerity and the deep conviction of my whole nature, that cannot possibly be appreciated by the thieves and plunderers that support it only for the opportunity it gives them to prey upon the Treasury. I look upon ourselves, sir, as engaged in a struggle, the issue of which is not yet, that is to decide the greatest questions that have ever been raised in the history of the world. It was one of the injunctions laid upon the ancient people of Israel that when the host went forth to battle they should do no wicked thing. When the host goes forth to battle, when the armies of your country, with their lives in their hands, go out to meet the embattled hosts that are gathered for the overthrow and the destruction of the national life, it becomes us by purity in the administration of our public affairs, by honesty in every walk of life, by every act that we do, to see to it that we do not by our national or personal sins at home hinder the beneficent purpose of a benign Providence that would smile upon our arms but for the baseness of the people whom they defend. Sir, the man that is guilty of public crime, the man that winks at frauds on the public Treasury, the man that seizes this hour, when the blood and treasure of the nation are poured out as they are being poured out, for the purpose of enriching himself at the expense of the public Treasury, commits a crime second only to that of him who is in arms against the cause of his country.

Let us, then, sir, dispassionately and calmly, as becomes men and statesmen, look, and look fearlessly and candidly, upon the condition of things which our country presents; where we have seen wrongs, let us remedy them; and again let us be careful here in this high council of the nation, where calmness and prudence and wisdom and justice are required of us, that we do not allow ourselves, from any mistaken impulse, wantonly and causelessly to assail the just reputation of those who are not before us and cannot answer for themselves.

Mr. President, I know that the careful and elaborate speech of the Senator from Iowa may be supposed to require a more minute, a more critical, and a better-prepared answer than I have been able upon the spur of the moment to make; but, sir, unprepared, incoherent, and undigested as it is, there is one thing I know, it is founded in truth, in justice, and in right. I have no friends to reward. The Senator spoke of the yards being filled with the political friends of some member of Congress. I neither know nor care to whom he alluded; but there is not in any navy-yard a single officer that holds his place, so far as I remember, by any recommendation or suggestion of mine. I do not know how it may be with others, nor do I care. But I trust that upon a subject so vital as the government of the Navy, so important to the best interests of the country, we will calmly and dispassionately weigh the subject, and come to the conclusion which justice, patriotism, and wisdom may require.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I have risen only to say a word. The speeches of the two Senators to-day have confirmed the suspicion that a very simple state of things exists. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, has stated here again and again, and did two years ago, with distinct emphasis, that the country had more to apprehend from the profligacy and corruption in the different Departments of the Government than it had from the enemy in the field. To-day in the opening of his remarks he admits that in the administration of the Departments, and especially of the Department with which he is more nearly officially connected, there is enormous corruption and speculation and robbery in the disbursements of the money appropriated to the Naval Department, and near the close of his speech he concedes that the Naval Department and the Government generally is infested with thieves and robbers. I suppose it is all true; I do not doubt that it is true, but here is the honorable Senator—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; I have but a word to say, and I will not detain you long. I will give place to the honorable Senator from Wisconsin in two or three minutes, and he may speak to his heart's content. But, Mr. President, what I am driving at is this: here is the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, a gentleman of rare ability, of great senatorial experience, a lawyer by profession, whose life has been appropriated to the ferreting out of crime and bringing criminals to punishment; he, as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, is peculiarly bound to perform this office in relation to the great and numerous delinquents in that Department. He ought not to content himself with the denunciation of speculation and of fraud and of robbery in general terms in the Naval Department or any other Department of the Government. He ought not to speak in general terms of thieves and robbers, and leave the matter there. From his concessions in relation to the Administration of our Government, there is none on earth, or that ever was upon earth, more corrupt. I am not informed as he is, but I have much reason to believe that his general assumptions are true; and if the matter were proved and investigated to individual cases throughout the Government its truth would be found not to be at all over-stated.

But while the honorable Senator is making these concessions, what does he show in the way of measures of reform to have been proposed by him and by his committee? What measures is he devising for the purpose of ferreting out and exposing and punishing the thieves and robbers that he admits infest the whole Government? Why does he not introduce his measures, well considered, efficient, and elaborately and carefully prepared, for the purpose of correcting and reforming this monstrous abuse that is so dangerous to the perpetuity of the Government and its institutions, according to his own concessions? If he knows of any thieves and robbers in his Department, why does he not hold them up to public scorn and condemnation and punishment by naming them? This admitting in vague and indefinite terms that a Department and a whole Government is corrupt, infested by thieves and robbers, and that the amount of plunder and speculation and robbery is enormous, amounts to nothing, corrects nothing, if such be the state of things.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. DAVIS. I will take my seat, if the Senator pleases, in a minute.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question the Senator put I desire to answer.

Mr. DAVIS. I am addressing myself to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HALE. That is against the rules; you ought to address the Chair. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. I look to the Chair but speak to you. [Laughter.] Now, sir, I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to enter on this work as a business man, in the detail of his duties as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs; let him hunt up and ferret out these enormous corruptions; let him ascertain who are the men that are engaged in them; let him introduce measures to reform these corruptions and to bring the men who are so corrupt and who are such thieves and plunderers to the public notice and to punishment and scorn.

Sir, I got up merely to make an expostulation with the Senator, and to bring his attention to the plain duty that devolves upon him as one of the ablest members of this body and as chairman of one of its most important committees, to reveal, to reform, to punish, to expose, and to bring to infamy and contempt both the corruption and the thieves and plunderers that have been so largely engaged in that infamous work.

Mr. HOWARD. I call for the special order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I appeal to the Senator from Michigan—

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to go on with the Pacific railroad bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I wish to say a single word in reply to the question of the Senator from Kentucky on the matter which has been discussed this morning.

Mr. HOWARD. I must insist upon proceeding with the consideration of the Pacific railroad bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume the consideration of the order of the day, unless by unanimous consent it be laid aside.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not desire to speak more than five minutes, I will say to my friend from Michigan; and it seems very extraordinary, after the long indulgence of this debate in reference to matters as to which I am one of a committee of investigation, to deny me the right to say a few words.

Mr. CONNESS. I object to any further consideration of that subject to-day. The Senator can have abundant time hereafter. The Pacific railroad bill awaits consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. With the indulgence of the Senator from Michigan I will make one remark. I do not rise to make any expostulation or to offer any argument—

Mr. CONNESS. I have objected to allowing the Senator from Wisconsin to proceed. Why should I object to his going on, and allow the Senator from Massachusetts to proceed? I object, sir.

• Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will bear in mind that I barely wish for one moment to vindicate a citizen of Massachusetts who has to-day been assailed; that is all.

Mr. CONNESS. I take it the Senator will excuse me for insisting upon our going on with the order of the day. That bill is of great consequence, and there will be abundant time for the vindication. The Senator knows well that the internal revenue bill awaits consideration, and that when it is taken up, until it shall be disposed of we can do nothing else. I hope the Senator will not ask to proceed now.

Mr. SUMNER. I only want to say one word; I think there can be no objection—

Mr. DAVIS. I object to the Senator's proceeding. The Senator from Massachusetts gets up here and by his importunity and by his pertinacity—

Mr. HALE. I object to the Senator from Kentucky proceeding. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will come to order. The business regularly before the Senate is Senate bill No. 432, being the Pacific railroad bill.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 132) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, the question pending being on the motion of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, to amend the amendment of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad by inserting after the word "thereof," in line six of section thirteen, the words "via Lawrence and Topeka."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, in relation to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas I can only say that I have no wish to do more than so to confine the route of the road that in locating it the towns of Lawrence and Topeka shall not have it in their power, to use a common expression, to bleed the railroad company; nor do I wish to have these towns placed in such a position that the railroad company can bleed the towns of Lawrence and Topeka. I am willing that that question should be settled on principles of justice and equity.

But, Mr. President, there is another word which I wish to say, and that is in answer to the question of the Senator from Kentucky to the Senator from New Hampshire, why, in his continual denunciation of frauds against the Administration he does not name the man that is guilty. I will answer.

Mr. CONNESS. What has this to do with Topeka? [Laughter.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator is entirely out of order in interrupting me. Mr. President, my answer is this: I have been engaged in an examination for weeks with the Senator from New Hampshire as the chairman, and the simple reason that he does not name the man is that there is not one man in the Navy Department, neither the head of it nor the head of any bureau, nor any clerk in that Department, against whom there is one shadow of evidence of fraud in the transactions of the Department. I say the evidence will so show, and I am prepared to show it when the evidence shall be reported. That is all the answer I have to make.

Mr. DAVIS. You must settle it with the Senator from New Hampshire, not with me. I made no charge.

Mr. POMEROY. When the Senate left the consideration of this Pacific railroad bill on Saturday, a motion was pending to so amend the bill that the Leavenworth and Pawnee road should go by the way of the towns of Lawrence and Topeka in my State. It was then thought that that would compel the company to build one or two bridges, and might subject them to some extra expense that would not be promotive perhaps of the public interest, but only of the interest of those towns. I propose, therefore, with the consent of my colleague, to modify that amendment so that it shall not subject the company to the expense of building any extra bridges, but allow them to construct their road on either side of the Kansas river that they may elect. It is not material to the purpose I have in view to confine them to either side. I only want the best interests of the road subserved, and let these towns have the incidental benefit that may accrue to them. I think that proposition is only a fair one. Topeka is the capital of the State, it is the seat of government, and it is only the incidental advantages arising from the building of this road that I expect to accrue to either of these towns. I desire to modify the amendment by saying in the seventh line, in section thirteen, on the 32d page, after the word "Missouri," "via Lawrence and Topeka, or on the bank of the Kansas river opposite those towns," so that the company may run the road on either side of the river, and shall not be required to build a single bridge or do anything to accommodate these towns otherwise than building the road up the valley so as to accommodate them, either on the one side or the other.

This matter has occupied the attention of the Senate too long. I do not want to argue it. I merely state the fact that I think the incidental advantages of building this road ought to accrue to these towns, and I want the company to build on either side of the river they choose, but I want them to build so as to accommodate the towns, whether they go on one side or the other, and I propose to modify the amendment so as to allow them to go on either side.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I suggest to my colleague that the amendment should come in after the word "thereof" in the sixth line of that section.

Mr. POMEROY. It makes no difference.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I accept the modification suggested by my colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas modifies his amendment to the amendment by proposing to insert after the word "thereof," in the sixth line of the thirteenth section, the words "via Lawrence and Topeka, or on the bank of the Kansas river opposite those towns."

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the Senator from Kansas whether that language is not too indefinite to compel the company to run their line near those two cities? I ask him whether the language is sufficiently definite?

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose it to be sufficiently definite. They are to run on "the bank of the Kansas river opposite those towns," or by the towns if they go up on the south side.

Mr. CONNESS. I then say that I hope this amendment will be made, and that it will be made sufficiently definite. I have had some conversation with parties who know that ground with great exactness and thoroughly, and have some knowledge of the facts stated by the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. LANE] when we were last considering the bill, and I am entirely satisfied that it is but an act of simple justice that this be done, so that the people of those towns shall not, that they may reap the incidental advantage that seems to be properly their due, be exposed to inflictions by these companies. I hope the amendment will prevail in such language as will compel its observance.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I made a statement on Saturday in reference to this subject. We give this company $24,000 a mile; we give them ten sections of land to each mile in addition. If this amendment be not adopted we give them power to black-mail the town of Lawrence and the town of Topeka to the tune of $500,000. They have already located their road within two and a quarter miles of the one town and within two miles of the other, and have said to the towns, "Now pay us $300,000 the one, and $200,000 the other, and we will bring the road to you." This ought not to be, in my opinion. Here is a Government project, a project that the Government enables these men to construct, and they undertake to levy black mail on the people of my State, fifteen thousand of whose children are now battling for the defense of the people of other States, and who have already during this rebellion suffered a loss of $3,000,000 in the way of depredations from the enemy; Shawneetown, Lawrence, Humboldt, Olathee, and Lanesfield have been laid in ashes by the hands of the rebels. This very town of Lawrence that will be robbed of $300,000 in this way, unless protected by the Senate, lost on the 21st of August last $1,100,000 at the hands of Quantrell's men. I want the chairman of this committee to understand that two and a quarter miles from Lawrence is land belonging to this company, and they have located their road at that point for the purpose of building up a town upon their own land to the destruction of Lawrence. I said on Saturday, and I now repeat, that there is nothing in nature to prevent this road being made to the river on the opposite side of these towns, and as an act of justice to the citizens of Kansas I ask the Senate to protect us from being black-mailed by this soulless railroad company.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas will be reported again. I wish to see how it reads.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

After the word "thereof," in line six of section thirteen, insert "via Lawrence and Topeka, or on the bank of the Kansas river opposite those towns."

Mr. HOWARD. Then I submit to the honorable Senator who offers the amendment that it may be best to strike out the words, "on the south side thereof," in the sixth line of the section, because if it goes through Lawrence and Topeka it must go on the north side of the river, as I understand.

Mr. POMEROY. Lawrence and Topeka are on the south side of the river; but the road must start on the south side in order to connect with the Pacific railroad of Missouri, which goes up to the State line, which is only about half a mile from the river. It must commence on the south side in order to make that connection. Then I want the company to be entirely free to go up the river on either bank they choose.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to have the language sufficiently precise.

Mr. POMEROY. The language will be right if this amendment prevails.

Mr. HOWARD. The honorable Senator knows better than I do the topography of the country there.

Mr. HENDERSON. When this question was up the other day, I made some remarks in regard to it, and I will state to the Senate now, so that there may be no mistake about it, the facts on which I based my remarks. As I said then, I have no objection to this road going by way of Lawrence and Topeka, provided it can be done. I do not know anything in reference to the road near Topeka, but I believe no actual survey has yet been made west of Lawrence, and therefore I do not know what the location of it may be.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. There has been a survey on both sides of the river.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have before me a map which has been submitted to me and upon which I based the remarks I made a few days ago, and I desire before Senators vote on this subject that they will look at the map showing the location of this road on the Kansas river. Lawrence is laid down upon the map, and the bend of the Kansas river at that place is shown and the points between which the road is located. I know nothing in regard to Topeka, but the map before me I presume to be a perfect map of the location of the route as far up as Lawrence, and any Senator can judge for himself. This is the engineer's survey, and all I desire is that it shall be properly understood.

I wish the Senators from Kansas to understand that I have no feeling in this matter; but I have the very warmest desire, if it can be done properly, that this road shall go by Lawrence and Topeka. In fact, as I stated the other day, I cannot conceive that any railroad company would undertake to construct this road within a mile or two miles of the town of Lawrence without going by the town, for I understand that it is a very thriving and industrious town, improving in population very rapidly; and it seems to me that if the railroad company could possibly take their line there without very great loss and inconvenience to themselves and without making a road that would be very costly and expensive in its operation, they would certainly go by that town in order to prevent any competition for that business hereafter.

I know nothing in regard to the intimation of the Senator from Kansas that there is an attempt to levy black mail on the town of Lawrence. I do not know even the members of this company except one, and he is a gentleman from my own State, who, I believe, has very recently been elected president of the company, John D. Perry, and I know no other man connected with it in any way whatever that I am now aware of, unless it be Mr. Hallett. I became acquainted with Mr. Hallett in December last, and had a conversation in reference to this very matter, springing out of a petition which the Senator from Kansas presented to me to sign, asking to have it go by the way of Lawrence, and which, I believe, I signed; but the subject was fresh upon my mind at the time, and I came to the conclusion that I had improperly signed that petition; and hence it was that the other day when this subject came up, remembering that I had examined this map, I made the few remarks that I did make.

I desire, and have desired from the beginning, to fix no points about this railroad by law, but to leave it to actual survey. When the question came up in regard to the Smoky Hill fork I wanted the railroad to run there, provided upon actual survey it should be determined to be the best route. I think that is the better plan now, to leave this question alone to the company, and let them select the most eligible route. That is my idea about it, and I think the proper plan for all of us to pursue is to do that and fix as few points as possible. At the last Congress, when a proposition was made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] to run the St. Joseph branch by way of Atchison, I opposed it on the ground that I did not desire to fix any points. I put a curve in the road; I desired to keep it out, but the Senate insisted on it, and it remained in. I shall not now undertake to move to strike out that point; but if I had my way about it, I would not leave that point in the bill. I do not desire to present any obstacles in the way of the passage of the bill, and much less do I desire to put obstacles in the way of a straight, direct, and proper road.

Why, sir, this is to be a great highway; it is to be a road to be operated in all time to come, from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, a road over two thousand miles in length. Every gentleman knows how expensive it is to operate a road in which there are short curves. A statement has been handed to me by some gentleman connected with this road, Mr. Perry perhaps, which I will read. If it is wrong the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LANE] can correct it:

"To run the main line of the Union Pacific railway to Lawrence will increase the length of the line two and a half miles. It will increase the length of the Leavenworth section two miles, and increase the curvatures of the first section of the main line two hundred and twenty-eight degrees, and make a loss of grading now completed, of six miles."

I understand that the company have already graded the road from where the creek, which Senators will see on this map, enters the Kansas river, for a distance of six miles west of the town of Lawrence. If it be now required that they go by way of Lawrence, I understand that grading will be lost.

"On any great commercial road, every mile that can be saved in distance, other characteristics of the competing lines being the same, is worth about $70,000. This is equal to the capital of, at six per cent., representing the annual expense of running and maintaining one mile of a first-class road doing a profitable business. For the four and a half miles increased length in the main line and Leavenworth section, this would amount to $315,000. That is to say, the short line would be worth this sum more than the line to Lawrence, assuming the grades and curvature to be the same; but add two hundred and twenty-eight degrees increased curvatures, and the amount will be still greater."

These are the facts that are furnished to me. I know but little about it; and I desire, once for all, that the Senator who takes so deep an interest in this amendment [Mr. LANE, of Kansas] shall not understand that I am in the least opposed to it if it can be done so as to secure a good road. All I desire is to have a good road, a straight road; and if this survey be correct the amendment proposes a curve in the road of two hundred and twenty-eight degrees, making such a road as will be almost inoperative in consequence of the sudden bend made in it. I do not know that this survey is correct; but if it is, certainly this amendment will make a very crooked road; and it will increase the distance, increase the cost, increase the curves, and the expense of operating the road infinitely.

Further, I desire to state one additional fact. There is a branch road being built from Leavenworth City, in Kansas, down to Lawrence, on the Kansas river, and according to my understanding that road runs down to Lawrence and crosses this road almost at right angles two and a quarter miles from the river. So Lawrence will have a branch of the main road anyway, and it will have in all probability the main stem, because in my State they are now talking of building a road from Lawrence, so as to tap the Hannibal and St. Joseph road, which would make the Leavenworth and Lawrence branch of this road in all probability the straight life. Whether that line will be constructed or not I cannot say; but Lawrence is not deprived of a railroad connection according to my understanding. I believe they are now constructing the road from Leavenworth to Lawrence, so that Lawrence will have a railroad connection direct with the main line to the Pacific. It is only upon this ground that I make any opposition whatever to the amendment. Really desiring, as I do, a straight line, one that will be least expensive in its operation, I must with my present views oppose the amendment.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am greatly surprised at the statements made by the Senator from Missouri. If they be true, God protect Lawrence from the men who are engaged in constructing this road. Last winter this very man, J. D. Perry, that the Senator speaks of, who is the moneyed man of the concern, wrote a letter in yonder marble room to Sam. Hallett directing him to make this road by way of Lawrence. In response to that letter Hallett telegraphed to me that the road should be made to Lawrence, and that telegram was published in the Lawrence papers. On last Thursday in that marble room J. D. Perry advised me to insist upon this amendment, and Sam. Hallett acquiesced in it. I would not like to take a map made by these men as evidence in this case. On last Thursday J. D. Perry told me to enforce this amendment, and Hallett acquiesced and said he had no objection to it. The map shows that making Lawrence a point on this road would extend it two miles, and they ask of us $300,000 to induce them to go around there. But the Senator says it will extend the Leavenworth road. Not one inch, for the reason that the Leavenworth road intersects the Lawrence road east of the creek on the map, at Coshocoon.

I have only to say that we have the promise of these men to make the road to Lawrence three times in letters to me and twice in telegrams; and while Sam. Hallett was telegraphing to me that the road should be made to Lawrence, his brother was in Lawrence telling the people that they would not make the road to Lawrence unless they gave them $300,000. The people of Lawrence telegraphed to me, and I saw him, and he told me the road should be made to Lawrence; and I do ask the Senate to protect the people of these two towns against these sharpers. I hope the Senator from Missouri is mistaken. I only give the facts; the letters and telegrams are matters of record.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to say once for all that I am not representing any gentleman connected with this company. The only question is whether this is a correct map or not. The Senator can state whether it is a correct or incorrect map of the river and of the country there. I do not know whether it is correct or not. If the Senator says the map is an incorrect one, very well. It has been furnished to me, and represented to be the survey made by the engineer of this company. If it is an incorrect map I am deceived about it. If it is a correct map it simply means that the amendment ought not to be adopted. I know nothing and I care nothing about it, except to have a straight road. The Senator understands my position, I hope. I am not the representative of anybody about this thing.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. My colleague and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] will bear me witness that the land opposite Lawrence and opposite Topeka is bottom land, and is as level as this floor. There is nothing in nature to prevent the road being made to Lawrence. Indeed, on an examination made when I was at home last fall, I am satisfied, although not much of a railroad man, that the least expensive route for this road is by the way of Lawrence and Topeka, on the river bank.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish the Senator from Kansas would state further, if he is able, whether this slight change of route is going to involve the necessity of making any portion of the road in that vicinity upon piles; whether the character of the ground is such as to admit of its being constructed on the surface?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have said that it is level bottom.

Mr. HOWARD. But is it hard and firm enough to sustain a road without being supported by piles or other artificial means?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Certainly. It is not overflowed; it is solid land, timber land, heavily timbered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment to the amendment, and declared it to be agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I misunderstood the question, and I desire to have a division or the yeas and nays on that subject. I thought the question was on the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] to the amendment of his colleague; but I wish to call the yeas and nays on the adoption of an amendment of that character.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator can do that when the bill is reported to the Senate. We are now in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question again, if there be no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. I suppose we can take the vote again in the Senate, and that will answer the Senator's purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to make a suggestion in order to avoid misapprehension on that subject. The amendment pending reported by the committee is a substitute for the whole bill, and I take it that it will be reported to the Senate as one amendment in the form in which it is finally agreed upon, and that this amendment to that amendment will not be reported and cannot be reached in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will undoubtedly be so, and the Chair will put the question again on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the committee, in section thirteen, line six, after the word "thereof" to insert "via Lawrence and Topeka, or on the bank of the Kansas river opposite those towns."

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 5, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, and Ten Eyck—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Henderson, McDougall, Van Winkle, and Wiley—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Coltamer, Doolittle, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Wilson, and Wright—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I move to insert at the end of the twenty-first section the following:

It is further provided, That should the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California complete their line to the eastern line of the State of California before the line of the Union Pacific Railroad Company shall have been extended westward so as to meet the line of said first-named company, said first-named company may extend their line of road eastward one hundred and fifty miles on the established route so as to meet and connect with the line of the Union Pacific road, complying in all respects with the provisions of this act as to said Union Pacific road, and upon doing so shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and benefits conferred by this act and the act to which this is an amendment on the said Union Pacific Railroad Company.

This amendment is one in which all interests,

I believe, concur. They have been consulted. The line of the Central Pacific Railroad Company in California would terminate in the mountains and would not accommodate the people of Nevada Territory. It is desirable to extend it still further as a matter of present business. It will be a long time before the Union Pacific railroad working westward can arrive at the Territory of Nevada. This amendment allows the California company to carry their line one hundred and fifty miles through into Nevada Territory and thus furnish facilities for their business. The representatives of the Union Pacific Company as well as of the Central Pacific Company concur in this amendment, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state, in addition to what my colleague has said, that in the act of 1862 this privilege was given to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and it is but continuing that act to put it in here.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Without the limitation.

Mr. HOWARD. I think there ought to be an amendment made in the phraseology of the amendment. The Central Pacific Railroad Company ought to be subjected to the same restrictions that are contained in this amendatory act; but the Senator has not incorporated that in his amendment. Why not give them the same privileges with the same restrictions?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOWARD. At the same time I regard the amendment as superfluous, because I think the company has already the same privilege; but still I have no objection to it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I will modify my amendment by inserting the words "and restrictions" after the word "provisions."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest this difficulty, which the chairman of the committee will perceive at once: This amendment gives to the California company in case it extends its road eastward all the privileges conferred by this act and the act to which it is an amendment. As this act gives one form of bounty and the act to which it is an amendment gives another form of bounty, the California company in case it extends its road eastward might claim the benefits of both acts; and therefore I desire the Senator from California to so modify his amendment as to avoid that difficulty.

Mr. HOWARD. It should be modified so as to confine it to the act we are now passing. This act in that regard supersedes the old act.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all I want, to avoid that difficulty.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Let it be so modified.

The PRESIDENT. It will be so modified. The Secretary will read it as modified.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

It is further provided, That should the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California complete their line to the eastern line of the State of California before the line of the Union Pacific Railroad Company shall have been extended westward so as to meet the line of said first-named company, said first-named company may extend their line of road eastward one hundred and fifty miles on the established route, so as to meet and connect with the line of the Union Pacific road, complying in all respects with the provisions and restrictions of this act as to said Union Pacific road, and upon doing so shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and benefits conferred by this act on the said Union Pacific Railroad Company.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill, to insert as a new section, after section seventeen, the following:

*And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of completing a railroad connection between the eastern termini of the road of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and Lake Superior, the Sioux City, St. Paul, and Lake Superior Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Minnesota, are hereby authorized to construct a railroad and telegraph line from the head of Lake Superior, in the State of Minnesota, via St. Paul and Mankato, to the southern boundary of said State in the direction of Sioux City, and to connect at said Sioux City with the Union Pacific railroad, upon the same terms and conditions and with like aid in all respects as the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California are or may be authorized by Congress to construct a railroad to the eastern boundary of the said State of California, to connect with said Union Pacific railroad: *Provided, Said Sioux City, St. Paul, and Lake Superior Railroad Company shall complete and fully equip and put in running order not less than fifty miles of its said road in one year from the passage of this act, and not less than fifty miles within each year thereafter.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. It is introducing another branch into the general system of roads. The amendment involves in it matters of so much importance that I think it had better run its risks upon a bill by itself. If it is a measure that is deserving of the attention of Congress, it will stand upon its own merits. I do not feel justified in allowing it to pass as an amendment to this bill. We have already got a sufficient number of branches connected with this main trunk; and if we go on multiplying the branches to this road there will be no end of that multiplication; there will be no end of the expense to be incurred by the Government. I think we had better put a stop to it here, and not adopt any more branches.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is true there are already a number of branches to this road; but I think none so important as this. I think that a connection with Lake Superior, as this amendment proposes, is indispensable to the very construction of this road. The greater part of it passes over an immense extent of treeless plains. They want timber, they want lumber, they want ties. Where can they get them, unless they get them from the valley of Superior? It is in this view, I think, indispensable for the company's own purposes. Then the people of the plains, the people of this immense gold region, will get their supply of fish from Lake Superior. Immense quantities of fish are salted and preserved there every year. In every view I think it is the most important branch there is to this main Pacific road. It only surprises me that the committee in their investigation and the preparation of this bill should have omitted it. I hope the Senate, however, will at once see the propriety of amending the bill in this particular.

Mr. CONNESS. It is a matter of surprise that the Committee on the Pacific Railroad did not discover that the Senator from Minnesota wanted five or ten million acres more of public lands for railroads in that State. I should like to ask the Senator, as it is proposed to run this branch through the celebrated Red river valley, whether they have not got all the land in that country now? I am sure the Senator is not in earnest in presenting this amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, sir, I am. I think it is really a valuable connection with the road; but the Red river is north and west of this connection.

Mr. HARLAN. There is no doubt but that the line of road proposed by the Senator from Minnesota is a valuable one, and that a railroad ought to be built on that line. In pursuance of that judgment the Committee on Public Lands reported a bill making a grant of land of ten sections to the mile from the head-waters of Lake Superior to St. Paul and then increased a donation that had previously been made from St. Paul in the direction of Sioux City four sections a mile; so that on that line they will now receive probably ten sections per mile. But if the Senator's amendment should be adopted it would enable them to secure in addition to that the interest on $24,000 worth of bonds per mile. I think perhaps it would not be well to give this additional encouragement to build that road, for the reason that other roads through Iowa and other parts of the country east of the termini of these branch roads would probably ask a similar subsidy. I, for example, should see no reason why a similar grant of bonds should not be made to aid Iowa in constructing roads across that State. This line of road will be all the way through the State of Minnesota, and we have already made the grant that I have just described.

Mr. RAMSEY. Part of it will be through Iowa.

Mr. HARLAN. A few miles probably will run through the northeastern corner of Iowa. We have already made this grant of lands to aid in the construction of the road to which the amendment of the Senator refers, and I think personally it would be as well to let the matter rest there.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer an amendment, to add at the end of the sixth section the following:

And provided further, That wherever settlements have been made prior to the passage of this act upon lands the timber upon which is herein granted to any company, there shall be reserved to the occupants or settlers in actual possession thereon the timber growing upon the lands so possessed by them.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. On page 34, section fourteen, line four, after the word "Atchison," I move to insert the words "commencing at St. Joseph, Missouri;" so that it will read:

That for the purposes herein mentioned the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company of Missouri is hereby authorized to extend its road from St. Joseph via Atchison, commencing at St. Joseph, Missouri, so as to connect and unite with said railroad through Kansas, &c.

It is a mere verbal amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. I have been informed that there is now a railroad completed and in use from St. Joseph to Atchison, through the State of Missouri, and if this amendment should be adopted it will simply require the construction of a road parallel with the road to which I have referred. I will inquire of the Senator from Missouri if I am right in the information that I have received.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is true; but the road is on the south side of the Missouri river. The Senator will see by looking to the proviso to the fourteenth section that the company is not bound to build the road by the way of Atchison at all, but may build it upon a line directly west, if a survey shall indicate that that is the best route. In that event, therefore, we want the road to commence at St. Joseph. The Senator will see the necessity of the amendment at a glance if he will look at the proviso. It is right. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Iowa is right in saying that there is a road from St. Joseph to Atchison on that side of the river at present. I do not suppose it is in harmony with the public policy to build two roads. If they shall adopt that road, I suppose it will answer all the purposes.

Mr. HENDERSON. But suppose they do not. That is just what I want to avoid.

Mr. POMEROY. If they do not, they have got to build on the opposite side of the river.

Mr. HENDERSON. To build straight west, Mr. POMEROY. If they build straight west, this amendment ought not to come in here; it should come in on the proviso.

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir; it is right here. Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Is it in order to offer a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Probably the Senator will accept it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would rather not at present. The Senator can offer it after I have amended this clause as I propose, and it will then be in order.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri whether this amendment will not involve the necessity of making a new branch; whether it does not provide for additional expenditure on the part of the Government?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have several amendments that I designed offering to this bill, but I believe that I shall retire from the field and offer none and oppose the whole bill. I have offered an amendment here which is nothing but a verbal amendment, to make plain what is intended, and without which this company need not build a road from St. Joseph, Missouri, at all. There is a road completed in my State from Hannibal, connecting with all the roads in the United States east, up to St. Joseph. This bill is so drawn that this Pacific railroad may commence at some other point than St. Joseph. It does not compel the company to commence at St. Joseph at all. That is just what I desire them to do. This section provides:

That, for the purposes herein mentioned, the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company of Missouri is hereby authorized to extend its road from St. Joseph via Atchison, so as to connect and unite with said railroad through Kansas.

They may commence at Atchison, and never build the road from St. Joseph at all. When the act of 1862 was under consideration I offered a proviso to prevent the necessity of its going to Atchison, because I did not want this road to turn off at an angle of forty-five degrees and run out of a straight line instead of going west; but the Senate decided that that must be done. Why? Because Atchison was a considerable town, and it was necessary that a great trunk railroad, built from the States east of the Mississippi river, upon which the commerce of the world is to be carried, should go down there. It is a very respectable town, in which my friend from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] lives; I am told it is a very thriving town, and I have no doubt of it, though I have never been there. It was decided that it must go by that town. I thought it ought not to go there. I did not say that it ought not to go there, but I thought the company ought to be left to select the best route. The best I could do was to get a proviso on the bill declaring that the company might build the trunk west on a straight line toward California without going by the way of Atchison. It was to be left to the people of Kansas; and the Legislature of Kansas, according to my understanding, after a terrible contest in that State, decided that the road might be built north of Atchison, without touching Atchison, thus showing that the Legislature of Kansas agreed with me on that point; but now this bill is prepared on an entirely different principle. Of course the Senator from Michigan does not intend it; I know his honest nature; I know what he intends; but as the measure now stands it compels the road to go by the way of Atchison instead of adopting what I succeeded in placing upon the bill two years ago and what the Legislature of Kansas indorsed me in doing. The proposition here is:

That, for purposes herein mentioned, the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company of Missouri is hereby authorized to extend its road from St. Joseph via Atchison.

I simply wish to insert there the words "commencing at St. Joseph, Missouri." What do you want to commence anywhere else for? What is the necessity of commencing anywhere else provided you do not build by Atchison? If the Senator from Michigan will look at the proviso, he will see the company have the right to build directly west by the way of Troy without going to Atchison at all. Then why not let them commence at St. Joseph? In commencing at St. Joseph they commence at the terminus of the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad. But, sir, as the bill stands, the company may be deprived practically of the privilege in accordance with the vote of the Kansas Legislature of commencing at St. Joseph at all. That is all I desire. It cannot do any harm. I am sorry to be compelled to offer the amendment. It is a mere verbal amendment, and I hope it may be adopted.

Mr. POMEROY. The only objection to this amendment, I suppose, is that it will compel the company to build two roads parallel to each other. The Senator from Iowa very well expressed it—

Mr. HENDERSON. Does the Senator say it will compel the company to build two roads?

Mr. POMEROY. That is if they go that way. This bill is so drawn that it is entirely optional with them to go one way or the other.

Mr. HENDERSON. With the permission of the Senator I will state that the Hannibal and St. Joseph road has no road from St. Joseph to Atchison. That is a separate and independent road, and is called the Platte country road in my State.

Mr. POMEROY. I was about to explain, if the Senator will allow me, precisely how it is. This section is so drawn that the Hannibal and St. Joseph road have it entirely at their own option to build straight out, as it is called, west from St. Joseph or to connect with the Kansas road via Atchison. The bill is also so drawn that if they conclude to connect with the Kansas company via Atchison, they may commence building there, because they run cars down that road now although they do not own the road. Although that company do not own the road, the road is built; they run their cars upon it, the connection is perfect and complete; and the reason why it is not necessary to commence building at St. Joseph, if they conclude to run that way, is that the road is already built; that is, another company has built it, and they use the road.

But the bill is so drawn that they are entirely free to go the other way if they choose to do so. I do not suppose, however, that it would be public policy for the Government of the United States to appropriate money to build one road parallel with another, even though another company owns it. That does not matter at all. The public interest is not promoted by building two parallel roads by the side of each other, even though different companies own them. As long as the Hannibal and St. Joseph company run cars over it and make connection, that is sufficient. If they conclude to go that way all that the Government can require is that they run their cars down there on the road already built, and then commence from there building west; but I repeat, they are entirely free to go the other way. They are not compelled to go that way. The bill is right in that particular as the Senator from Michigan wrote it.

Mr. HENDERSON. The misfortune about this whole thing arises from the fixing of the location of this route in the beginning. Having once got it in this fix we are compelled to go by Atchison, deflecting from a straight line at least forty-five degrees. The object—I will not say object, for I do not charge any design about it—the effect of the present legislation taken in conjunction with the former bill will be to compel the road to start from Atchison. That is what I want to avoid. If they can make an arrangement with the Platte country road to use it, I have no idea that they will build another road; but my proposition is that if they build it the other way they shall commence at St. Joseph and not elsewhere. I do not think there is any objection to it. A straight line as I propose to enable this company to build makes it necessary that this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The proposition of the Senator from Missouri is so clearly right that I cannot doubt that the Senate will adopt it, if it be understood. It is to make it sure that this road shall commence at St. Joseph, and run thence westward or southwestward by Atchison. The point is that it shall start at St. Joseph; and it is an important question. Is it the intention of the Senate that this Pacific railroad shall make a connection with that very important road, the Hannibal and St. Joseph road? If the Senate intend that, it ought to be stated plainly. The Hannibal and St. Joseph road is a road that was constructed in part by the Government of the United States. As a member of the House of Representatives a number of years ago, I felt it to be my duty to vote in favor of a land grant to enable the State of Missouri to build that very important road, and I gave a reason in the House so far back as that, that I voted for the grant because I thought that road would at some time be a connecting link with the Pacific line of railroad. I now want to see that made certain in the Senate to-day which I contemplated in that vote in the House of Representatives ten years ago. Can the Senate hesitate to say in plain terms that this Pacific road shall connect with the great road running through the State of Missouri, the Hannibal and St. Joseph road, which was built in part by aid from the Government of the United States with a view to this very connection?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not think there is any uncertainty or any obscurity in the language of this fourteenth section. The clause proposed to be amended reads as follows:

That, for the purposes herein mentioned, the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company of Missouri is hereby authorized to extend its road from St. Joseph via Atchison, so as to connect and unite said railroad through Kansas.

Can there be any doubt that it is the duty of this railroad company to commence this extension at St. Joseph? It seems to me impossible to entertain a doubt on that subject. It is the plain, direct meaning and intent of the language, as I understand it; and I therefore regard the amendment of my friend from Missouri as superfluous if the purpose of that amendment be to give it any greater certainty than it has already. This extension must begin at St. Joseph, and it must extend "via Atchison;" that is, through Atchison. Can there be the slightest doubt about it? St. Joseph is on the left bank of the Kansas river, about twelve miles north of the boundary line between Nebraska and Kansas. Atchison is on the right bank of the river, that is, the western bank of the river; and this extension, if I understand it properly, must cross the river somewhere and go through Atchison. I may be in error about this, for I know nothing about the topography except what I learn from the maps and from the conversations I have held with those who have been there; but such I regard to be the undoubted and unquestionable meaning of the language and its effect. If I am wrong, I should like to be corrected.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was aware that the Senator from Michigan intended just what I intend. He says now that there is no doubt about the construction; that he intended just what I desire to accomplish by my amendment. If that be true, then my amendment makes it perfectly certain to carry out what he intends. Therefore there can be no difference between us. I desire to use language that will make what he desires to obtain perfectly certain. Then there can certainly be no objection to use the language I propose. I knew the Senator so designed.

Mr. HOWARD. The question I put to the honorable Senator from Missouri was whether his amendment would not necessitate a further outlay on the part of the Government; in other words, whether it would not require the construction of another and additional branch?

Mr. HENDERSON. Not at all.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well. If the Senator had answered the question which I put to him in the first place, we should have had no difference of opinion.

Mr. HENDERSON. I misunderstood the Senator. I answer him now that it does not necessitate the construction of any other branch.

Mr. HOWARD. That is clear on that point.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In agreeing to this bill in the committee I was opposed to adding anything more to it. I think we are committing the Government by the bill as presented here to as great an extent as we ought to go; but I understand the proposition of the Senator from Missouri as involving the Government in the expense of building a road at $24,000 a mile from St. Joseph to Atchison. The distance I do not know, but I suppose it to be thirty or forty miles.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Twenty miles.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The sum then would be $480,000 additional expense in which the Government will be necessarily involved if this amendment prevails. It is on that ground that I am opposed to it; as the bill now stands the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company may make their connection with the main road, and they may make it over the line already constructed. As the bill is proposed to be amended by the Senator from Missouri, it will require them to commence the construction of a branch road at St. Joseph. Now they have got to connect with the main trunk from St. Joseph, but they may connect by means of a road that is already built for twenty miles, while this amendment compels them to make a new road from St. Joseph. That is all there is in it. I would not compel them to do that. It adds just that much more, and, as has been said, there being already a road to Atchison on one side of the river, this would authorize them, if they thought proper, to make a road on the other side of the river, and you would have two roads, one running down one side of the river and the other on the other side from St. Joseph to Atchison, a distance of twenty miles. I do not think the Government of the United States in entering upon this great enterprise of constructing a road across the continent should go into this little squabble as to which side of the Missouri river is to have this railroad line. I trust the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I regret very much that it becomes necessary for me to say anything in answer to such remarks as have just been made. I explained once before, and the Senator from Illinois seems determined not to understand, or else he cannot understand, that the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company does not own one inch of road between St. Joseph and Atchison.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Missouri tell me of what interest it is to this nation whether the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company owns it or not?

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator the other day stuck so tenaciously to the legislation of the last Congress that he would not suffer an amendment to be made to this bill which would improve that legislation; and I ask him now, in all conscience, if he intends to compel this road to start from Atchison instead of St. Joseph, if he is not willing to let the law of the last Congress stand in this respect, which enables the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company to build a railroad directly west from St. Joseph instead of going to Atchison. That was the legislation of the last Congress; but I undertake to say that if the provision, with the Senator's construction, remains as it appears in the present bill, the company will get rid of the construction of any road from St. Joseph, and in fact may commence at Atchison, and defeat the very object of the original bill. The Senator ought to know that Atchison is southwest from St. Joseph, while a straight route to California would go from St. Joseph a little north of west in order to reach the initial point which he compelled us to take the other day. St. Joseph is in about latitude 40°. The initial point will be about 41°. Instead of allowing us to run north of west to reach the initial point, he now compels us to go down to Atchison, which is directly southwest, and gives us no privilege whatever of going west. That is what I object to. If the company wants to go down by way of Atchison I have no objection, and I shall not move to strike that out; but what I desire is, that the construction of the road shall be commenced at St. Joseph in case they do not make an arrangement to go to Atchison such as is indicated. If they want to make an arrangement to go to Atchison, I have no objection; but suppose they determine to build it by the other route, how then are we to get the road west from St. Joseph according to the construction given by Senators? I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will tell the Senator how he will get the road west from St. Joseph. If he will look at the proviso on page 36 he will find that it says:

Provided, That if said Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company shall deem it desirable, it may construct said extension, with the consent of the State of Kansas, on the most direct and practicable route west from St. Joseph, Missouri, so as to connect and unite with the railroad hereinafter mentioned, &c.

Is there any difficulty in the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company constructing their road west? They need not go to Atchison; the bill does not compel them to go to Atchison.

Mr. SHERMAN. "With the consent of the State of Kansas."

Mr. TRUMBULL. Can you build to Atchison without the consent of the State of Kansas?

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe the State of Kansas has already given consent to build a straight road.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Suppose it has not; you are involved in the same difficulty in both cases. How are you going to build a railroad down to Atchison without the consent of Kansas? And I ask the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] what more he wants? Everything is here that is necessary to be here, unless you want two rival roads on opposite sides of the Missouri river, and to appropriate the money of this Government to build one of them.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have an amendment here such as I think the Government demands, and the interests of our State require. It is to commence this branch at Fort Leavenworth, and run it through Atchison, Troy, and Marysville. The Hannibal and St. Joseph Company has a road graded to Troy, which is immediately west of St. Joseph. By running to Troy you give the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad a western connection. I do not propose to-day to discuss this question. I have asked the Secretary of War to furnish the Senate with a statement of the amount that the Government pays yearly for transporting Government supplies from Fort Leavenworth to Fort Kearney and Fort Laramie. It will be found when that comes in that it is indispensable to connect Fort Leavenworth with those points; that the expense that accrues to the Government every year for transporting Government supplies from Fort Leavenworth to Fort Kearney and Fort Laramie will almost pay the amount that the Government agrees to pay on these hundred miles. The military road now to Fort Kearney, the initial point of the branch I propose, runs from Fort Leavenworth within four miles of Atchison, close to Troy, and through Marysville. By adopting this amendment we can accommodate Atchison, we accommodate the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad, and we accommodate the Government in transporting supplies from Fort Leavenworth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected. Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I will now present my amendment. In section fourteen between the words "via" and "Atchison," in the fourth line, I move to insert "Fort Leavenworth," and after the word "Atchison," in the same line, to insert "Troy, and Marysville, (with the consent of the Legislature of Kansas from Fort Leavenworth to Atchison,) and by any company now chartered by said State for the remainder of the route."

Mr. POMEROY. This amendment cannot be offered in any sincerity. We cannot extend a road from St. Joseph down to Fort Leavenworth, which is forty miles directly south of St. Joseph, and then bring it back again up to Troy, which is twenty miles west from St. Joseph. There is some mistake about the points of the compass.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. There is a road already from St. Joseph to Fort Leavenworth, or within three miles of it, the Platte country railroad. I propose to commence this branch at Fort Leavenworth, the depot for Government stores for the whole western country. It has no connection with this great work across the continent; I propose to give it a connection, to run it as the military road now runs, through Atchison to Troy, which gives to the Hannibal and St. Joseph road a western connection, Troy being directly west of St. Joseph, and the road being graded from St. Joseph to Troy and four or five miles of iron laid upon it, running through Marysville as the military road now runs, thereby connecting Fort Leavenworth with Fort Kearney. I shall be able to show to-morrow, when I get an answer to the resolution I introduced to-day, that we pay out for transportation from Fort Leavenworth to Fort Kearney yearly more than the Government agrees to pay on these one hundred miles of road.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say a few words to the friends of this bill, and I do so in all kindness. The Senate have been occupied some three or four days in discussing the details of the bill, and they have scarcely made any change worth noticing. To-morrow the revenue bill comes up, which, in all human probability, will crowd this out of the way if it be not very soon disposed of. I assure Senators who are interested in the passage of this bill much more than I am, that any further delay in the consideration of the bill is likely to endanger its passage at the present session of Congress.

I shall vote for the bill with extreme reluctance. I made up my mind in committee to vote for it, but I do so with great reluctance, and chiefly because of the numerous branches attached to it both in the old bill and in the new one. There is no reason in the world why the Government of the United States should build a single one of these branch roads. The construction of a Pacific railroad to connect the Atlantic with the Pacific is an object of great national importance; but the Pawnee and Leavenworth branch, and the Omaha branch, and the branch now being discussed we all know practically are of no national use to the Government. The State of Kansas ought to build her road with the ordinary land grant, and all these branches ought to be built with the ordinary land grants.

The bill cannot be justified on principle except as to the main trunk from the one hundredth degree of longitude to the eastern boundary of California. The branch roads in the State of California and in other States ought to be built by the ordinary grants of land. Two years ago, however, we passed a Pacific railroad bill providing for various branches, and I felt bound by the action of Congress to support the appropriation for those branches, changing the mode of assistance rendered by the national Government; but I assure Senators that if they put any more branches in this bill, if they load it down any more, I certainly will not in this time of war vote for it. The most we ought to do now, it seems to me, is to provide for one great national line.

I speak now entirely disinterestedly in regard to these branches. I do not care whether the main road starts from Leavenworth, or from Kansas City, or from St. Joseph, or from Atchison, or from Omaha; it makes no difference to me. One road ought to be constructed. These branches have been put on for the purpose of reconciling local interests. I shall vote for this bill retaining the branches provided for in the old law, but I will put on no additional branch.

I know enough of the geography of the country to know that the proposition of the honorable Senator from Kansas is absurd. In my judgment a railroad running from St. Joseph down the Platte country to Leavenworth, and then crooking up along the Missouri river by way of Atchison, and then going west, would be absurd. Besides, that branch under the provisions proposed, would be one hundred miles long. What interest has the Government of the United States to build a road to Atchison, or to St. Joseph, or to any other point? They may be very important points to gentlemen living near them, but they are utterly insignificant in the geography of the United States.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Is Fort Leavenworth insignificant?

Mr. SHERMAN. Although it is a depot of military supplies, which can be removed probably for $100,000, and although it is a rapidly growing town of ten or fifteen thousand inhabitants, it is in the geography of this country a mere mote; not to be considered. The fort may be removed, the fort may be burned down; we are losing every day by our military operations more than all that Fort Leavenworth is worth. I have been there and know all about it; it is a beautiful place; but when you look at the value of Fort Leavenworth in a national point of view, it is of utter insignificance.

I say, therefore, that if the friends of this bill desire to pass it I recommend them just to take the bill as it has been considered and elaborated in the committee, with as few amendments as possible, and let us have a vote on it so that it will be out of the way of other bills that will probably crowd it out unless it be very speedily disposed of.

Mr. HOWARD. If there was one subject upon which more than upon another the committee to whom this bill was referred were unanimously in accord, it was that we would not recommend any further branches to be attached to this road; that we would not extend one single inch to new branches the privileges which we have extended to the main trunk and to the branches connected with it by the act of 1862; and for this plain reason, that we must put on the brake somewhere, and we may as well do it now as at any time. If we yield to the importunities of persons interested in these various branches from time to time we shall yield once and again until we have saddled the Government with a most enormous debt. If there be any scheme which has merits in and of itself, I do beg Senators to present it separately and distinctly for the consideration of this body, and not embarrass the passage of this bill by attempting to put it in by way of amendment. Let us act upon this bill if we can, and pass it. But I give the Senator from Kansas and others who may concur in his views notice that whenever there shall be another branch road created and attached to this bill, I shall vote against the whole bill and against the whole scheme henceforth and forever, for I see the difficulties which are perpetually growing out of the increase of the branches. We must stop, and we must stop here and now; otherwise we shall lose the whole scheme; the enterprise will be swamped by making it so enormous and elephantine in its proportions that it will be utterly unwieldy not only for the individuals and companies concerned, but for the Government itself.

Mr. WADE. Do you retain all the original branches?

Mr. HOWARD. We have retained all the original branches as a matter of justice, and Kansas wants another now. I trust this will not be pressed upon the consideration of the Senate. I cannot vote for it if another branch is attached to it, and will not.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Mr. President, my proposition is misunderstood entirely—

Mr. HOWARD. It is the last feather that breaks the camel's back.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to say that the proposition which I have brought before the Senate has shaken my State from base to summit. It was this very proposition that brought on that premature senatorial election last winter. Therefore I feel it a duty I owe to my State to bring it forward. I do not propose to add one cent to this bill. This branch is limited to one hundred miles. All I propose is to start it at Fort Leavenworth, instead of Atchison; Fort Leavenworth is eighteen miles from Atchison; I propose to run it from Fort Leavenworth to Atchison, from Atchison to Troy, which gives to the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad a western outlet, and from there to Marysville, following the military road.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] should not have denounced this scheme as absurd. I do not propose to make a road down the river on the other side from St. Joseph. There is a road already built there. I propose, instead of commencing this one hundred mile branch at Atchison, to commence it at Fort Leavenworth; and I propose to have it intersect the Hannibal and St. Joseph road at Troy, to which a section is already graded and on which four miles of the iron have been laid down. It will not do for gentlemen to warn me that I am overloading this bill, when I am doing no such thing. I propose to connect Fort Leavenworth with Fort Kearney, and I heretofore state that the Government pays annually for transporting Government property from Fort Leavenworth to Fort Kearney as much as the interest on the Government aid for the whole one hundred miles will be.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not desire to discuss this bill, but this amendment of my colleague I never heard of before, and I do not believe there is a company in my State organized to build the road it contemplates. I never heard of anybody that wanted a road built in that direction. This is the first time I ever knew of a proposition to build a railroad from Fort Leavenworth to Atchison by the way of Troy or any other place. I will say further—I know it is late and I will not take up time—that Fort Leavenworth is already accommodated by the Leavenworth and Pawnee road; and it surely is not necessary to commence two branches at one place. The proposition is ridiculous. I never heard of anybody being for it before.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask the Senator, my colleague, and I desire a categorical answer, was not the fact that he proposed to run the road through Atchison on the parallel line, instead of through the county seats Troy, Seneca, and Marysville, the cause of the revolution in our State? Did he never hear of that?

Mr. POMEROY. I will say distinctly that I never before heard of building a road from Fort Leavenworth according to the proposition contained in my colleague's amendment.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask my colleague if he never heard of a desire on the part of the northern tier of counties to have a railroad running west from St. Joseph.

Mr. POMEROY. I certainly did; but Leavenworth is not in the northern tier of counties; Leavenworth is down forty miles south.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me appeal to my friend from Kansas, [Mr. LANE.] Let us, if possible, get a vote on some of these amendments. This bill has been under discussion now the best part of five days. Does he not see as distinctly as the sun in heaven that this bill will be lost if he persists in offering such amendments and protracting the discussion? ["Vote," "Vote."]

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to say that this amendment would accomplish the object which I have had in view. By the amendment I should accomplish that object if the Senate would adopt it. If it be adopted the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, by building a road twenty miles, I believe the best part of it already graded, directly west from St. Joseph, would have a road to the main trunk in a very short time, and the Government aid from Troy west would be given to it. That would be the result of the proposition made by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. LANE,] but that does not suit my worthy friend on the left, [Mr. POMEROY.] Why? Because it commences the road down at Leavenworth, and Leavenworth has already been provided with the Leavenworth and Pawnee branch, as it is called. Under the bill you are passing here to-day there never will be a railroad built from St. Joseph, although the company in my State have gone on and graded, as I understand, some twelve or fifteen miles of road in the direct line of Troy. That will all be abandoned, there never will be a railroad there, but the route will be deflected from the main line and run down to Atchison, and from Atchison it will deflect northwest again, thus giving a road not quite so objectionable as the one presented by my friend on the right, [Mr. LANE,] but certainly very objectionable. It is against that that I have stood up all the time. I have been defeated. Now, I cannot go with my worthy friend on the right, although his amendment will accomplish all I want. I intend to be consistent, although at the expense of my State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, and declared that it was rejected.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask the favor of the Senate to grant me the yeas and nays on this question. ["No," "No."]

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me appeal to the Senator to take the yeas and nays when we get into the Senate, if he wants them; there is no need for having them twice.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Very well. I withdraw the call now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will venture to offer a second amendment; I have offered only one. Senators say we must not offer any amendments, but I hope they will remember that I have offered but one, and have sat quietly while a great many amendments were offered by others. I move on page 35, in lines thirty-three and thirty-four of section fourteen, to strike out the words "the route and location of said extension from Atchison shall be subject to the approval of the President of the United States." I do not want another legislative indorsement to the effect that this branch shall commence at Atchison anyhow. Another thing, I do not want the President to determine the route of a railroad that has been already located under the old bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope this alteration will not be made.

Mr. POMEROY. There is not the least importance in this, and there can be no objection to the amendment. You have got to make the connection within one hundred miles, and if engineers have located it there is no use in getting the President's approval. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am exceedingly gratified to have the indorsement of my friend from Kansas, [Mr. POMEROY,] and to see how quietly my friend from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] takes it: he does not object to it, because I have the indorsement.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know what is meant by that reflection. I recognize no right in the Senator from Missouri to read me a lecture upon the proprieties appertaining to this body or to my duties here. I am waiting for the vote to be taken upon his proposition, and I shall vote against it. I do not wish, however, to spend the time of the Senate. Whether I am quiet or disorderly I wish to be the master of my own conduct and not to appeal to him.

Mr. HENDERSON. What I said was not intended with a view of reading a lecture to the Senator. What I stated I stated. So soon as I made the proposition the Senator, as usual, made the objection, hoped it would not be done. My friend from Kansas rose, and the very moment he said it was all right the Senator from Michigan took his seat. He was reading me a lecture I thought for offering the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator is mistaken as to the matter of fact; he did not observe what was proceeding in the Senate. I objected to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri because I dissented from it and thought it an improper amendment. I then took my seat. The Senator from Kansas then arose and said a word in favor of the amendment. I made no reply. Was it necessary for me to make a reply? Has the Senator from Missouri any right to infer from the fact of my silence that I had changed my mind and was in accordance with the Senator from Kansas? When he has known me longer, sir, he will know me better.

Mr. HENDERSON. I simply desire to state that the Senator is mistaken. He was standing on the floor when the Senator from Kansas made his remarks, and did not take his seat until the Senator from Kansas was through.

Mr. DAVIS. I am a friend to this measure, and I voted for it at the last Congress. The measure was then upon its trial, upon its test whether it was to get the sanction of the Senate of the United States or not. I listened with much pleasure to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in relation to this bill a few minutes since. I think they were eminently just, wise, and proper. It seems to me that as far as it can be done, the points that were prescribed in the law of the last Congress ought to be adhered to at the present time. I understand, however, that there is some deviation.

Mr. HOWARD and Mr. TRUMBULL. Oh, no; we voted that down.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that there are two towns in Kansas that were not named as points in the road as the law was passed at the last Congress, that have been introduced into the bill in the form of an amendment this evening.

Mr. CONNESS. That does not add anything.

Mr. DAVIS. The way to obviate difficulties in relation to points of locality is not to introduce any. Put the verbiage of this bill in relation to points of locality in the road as it was in the last law, and I shall have no objection.

Like the Senator from Ohio, I am a friend to this measure as a great national measure connecting the two oceans across the continent. I want to give the measure my support as I did then; but I want to do it upon the terms and understandings of members of the Senate when the law was passed two years ago. In that form it received the sanction of the Senate, and I do not think there ought to be any departure in relation to points in the road or localities fixed, from what was then agreed upon.

The question being put upon the amendment to the amendment, there were, on a division—ayes 14, noes 8; no quorum voting.

Mr. CONNESS and others called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. I think there is no possibility of getting a vote on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is not in order while the Senate is dividing. The question is on seconding the call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Carlile, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Pomerooy, Powell, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Willey—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Howard, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wade—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Wilkinson, Wilson, and Wright—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I offer an amendment to come in on page 21 of the bill as printed this morning. I will read the clause and then suggest my amendment:

The rails and other iron used in the construction and equipment of the said road shall be of American manufacture, of the best quality, except so much thereof as shall be needed for two years next after the approval of this act.

I move to strike out the words "except so much thereof as shall be needed for two years next after the approval of this act." I do not wish to make it a subject of debate and I am entirely willing that the vote shall be taken upon it without discussion, so far as I am concerned. My motion is to strike out the exemption, and that will make it necessary to construct the whole work of American iron.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senate will not strike out that clause. I think it is a very important provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. That exception was adopted after a long discussion in committee and after full consideration.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, Mr. President, after a very full discussion in the committee. I do not offer the amendment on behalf of the committee, but on my own motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust it will not be adopted, because the Senator merely speaks for himself.

Mr. HOWARD. I speak merely for myself, not for the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. That exception was adopted after grave consideration in view of the impossibility of procuring the iron now in this country.

Mr. CONNESS. If this amendment is to be adopted, I have an amendment prepared that I shall offer in lieu of the words thus stricken out, but if it be not adopted I will not offer this amendment. I will read it, so that it may be understood. I propose to make the clause read:

Except so much thereof as shall be needed for the use of the portion of the Pacific railroad lying westward of the eastern boundary of California, which exception shall continue until the end of the present rebellion.

I have summed up before me—which will not take a moment to state, and I invite the attention of Senators to it—the cost of shipment and insurance from the Atlantic seaboard to California pending the war and before the war. Before the war it was $8 90 a ton. It has since the war, by the increase made necessary by it, become $34 05 per ton. It will appear at once that the privilege, if this is stricken out, of extending this exception to the California portion of the road is a very material one, and I would ask the Senator to accept my suggestion; but I will let the vote be taken first on the proposition of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think there will be any occasion for the amendment which the Senator from California contemplates offering. The question itself which the proposition of the chairman of the committee presents to the Senate was before the committee, very carefully considered, as he will remember, and we came almost to the unanimous opinion that the enterprise would be defeated unless the parties were permitted to import their iron for two years. All the works in the Union are now so full of employment by the Government itself that it is utterly impracticable to get the iron here. I am sure that if the Senator from Michigan was of that opinion he would not persevere in his amendment. It can be got from England, at a pretty high price, to be sure, but it cannot be obtained in the United States in any reasonable time; and, as I said in the beginning, it was because of that information, coming to us in such an authentic form that it could not be doubted, that we came to almost the unanimous conclusion that it would be well to give to these companies the authority to import their iron for a limited time.

Mr. HOWARD. What the Senator from Maryland says is entirely true; such was the sentiment of the committee when this matter was before them for consideration. I have since been informed, however, by gentlemen well acquainted with the iron trade, that it is very practicable to procure the American iron in this country even by introducing iron from abroad and exchanging it for it. However that may be, I do not wish to spin out the discussion, and I will therefore, by the leave of the Senate, withdraw my amendment, and permit the bill to stand as it is in this respect.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I wish to offer an amendment. Section twelve provides "that the Government of the United States shall be permitted to transport its mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon as favorable terms as individuals can secure the same service from the company." I move to amend the section by inserting after the word "service," in line sixteen, these words:

Provided, That officers and enlisted men in the military, naval, or revenue service of the United States, on furlough, may pass over the roads named in this act at one half the rate established for other passengers, or one half the rate contracted for by the United States for transportation, if less than the rate established for other passengers.

The roads, in my opinion, will be debarred from no income by the adoption of this amendment. Furloughs to men in the Army and Navy of the United States are very few; and hereafter when our Army or Navy may be established on the Pacific coast the distance over this road will be so great that if charged the usual fare they will not be able to reach their homes. It is my experience that men in the public service, on account of the tax thus imposed, have been deprived of the privilege of visiting their families when it was perhaps important that they should be allowed to do so. My opinion is that the adoption of this provision will secure the travel over the road of an increased number of passengers, and in the end secure as much income as would be received without the provision. I am in favor of the bill to every extent, and I trust this amendment will meet the approbation of Senators.

Mr. WILKINSON. Is the amendment subject to amendment? ["No."]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in the second degree now.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate having perfected the substitute, will now proceed to the first amendment of the committee to the bill.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I move that the amendments be taken together.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that we shall take the question on all the amendments together, unless some gentleman wishes to except a particular one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators do not understand the Chair. The committee to whom this bill was referred reported the bill back with sundry amendments to the original bill. They afterwards reported an amendment by way of substitute. The Senate has perfected the substitute, but has not acted upon the amendments to the original bill. Those must be first disposed of.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then to have it understood, we do not want to adopt the amendments to the original bill. If we reject them, then this substitute will come up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that they may be all rejected together by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that will be done; or, to make it more formal, I move that the Senate disagree to the former amendments of the committee to the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and those amendments are rejected.

The substitute of the committee, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to strike out the latter half of section four, on page 15.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me appeal to the Senator from Indiana; let us now get the bill into the Senate, and then it will be open to amendment, and we shall not have to vote twice, and that will get rid of these other amendments.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let it be reported to the Senate, and then it will be open to amendment still.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring, in the Senate, with the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I want a vote on my proposition.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it is now in order, I move the amendment which I suggested before. It is on page 15, section four, to strike out the residue of the section after the word "road" in line ten. The words to be stricken out are:

And in case said company is desirous of becoming purchasers of the fee of such lands containing coal and iron ores, patents therefor shall be issued to said company by the Government of the United States at the price at which such Government lands are sold at the time such patents issue: Provided, That said company shall, within ten years, make its selection of the land it desires to purchase, and that the lands so selected shall not exceed in area one hundred thousand acres.

It will be observed by the Senate that the first part of this section allows the company to go upon the Government lands adjoining its road for the purpose of getting material for the construction of the road, and going also upon mineral lands for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the road. That is all right. I think that is very proper. But the part of the section which I propose to strike out contemplates that the company shall become the owner in fee, not with the view of selling but of holding, to the extent of one hundred thousand acres of coal and iron lands. I cannot see the propriety of this. Is it the intention of the Senate that this railroad corporation shall become a mining company or a company manufacturing iron? The Senate has already decided that the company shall not go on the adjoining lands for the purpose of getting iron to keep the road in repair—that question was decided on Saturday by an amendment then adopted—but only for the purpose of constructing the road. Why, if that be the view of the Senate in that regard, shall the Senate allow to this corporation the privilege of becoming the owner in fee at $1 25 an acre, of valuable iron and coal lands when those lands if exposed, according to the general laws of the United States, at public sale might bring very much more when purchased by citizens?

A further objection which I have is that the power of this corporation will be quite sufficient without allowing it to go into the industrial pursuits which are ordinarily reserved from corporations to the citizens.

Mr. FOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn. ["Vote," "Vote."] Will you guaranty a vote within half an hour?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOOT. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. I do not wish to spend time in discussing it. It has been fully discussed before. The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. There was one amendment made in committee upon which I wish to take a vote distinctly, and that was in section two, relating to contracts for labor, service, materials, &c. It was struck out in Committee of the Whole, and I wish now to insert the clause with a modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator must move to insert the words.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to insert the clause in this form:

All contracts for the grading, building, and construction of said railroad, and for supplying the rolling stock thereof, which may be made by or on behalf of said company, shall be terminable at the pleasure of said company, or of the directors thereof, by notice in writing to the other contracting parties, their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns; and upon and after service of such notice, all liability and obligation on account thereof, on the part of the company, shall cease and determine, except in so far as performance shall be by either party required during the six months next succeeding such service; and all such contracts of said company shall contain, or be deemed to contain, a clause providing for such termination thereof.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is rather a severe provision, and I think that was spoken of in committee. Without the amendment, it will be in the power of the company to insert a clause of that sort in their contracts; but with the amendment, all contracts would be liable to that reservation of power on the part of the company, and I am very much inclined to think that no good contractor perhaps would be willing to enter into a contract of that description.

Mr. HOWARD. The great object is to protect the rights and interests of the company against any possible fraud that might be committed by one board of directors in the letting of the vast contracts which will have to be let. For instance, a board of directors this year might let upon contract the construction of the whole road between the one hundredth degree and the western boundary of Nevada Territory, and the contractors would have a right to go on upon the contract and construct the entire line at the price fixed by the first board of directors, and the company would forever be without any remedy. It does seem to me that this is exposing the company.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow me to ask the Senator, if such a contract should be made and fraud could be proved between the directors and contractors, does he hold that the company would be bound by it?

Mr. HOWARD. Such a contract may be made without the slightest fraud.

Mr. FOSTER. If an honest contract, why should it be broken?

Mr. HOWARD. An honest contract but totally ruinous to the company.

Mr. JOHNSON. The effect of that will be that if the contract, in the judgment of the company, is to be a losing one to the contractor, it will not be put an end to; but if by a change of circumstances it is obvious that it will be to the interest of the company to put an end to it because it will give to the contractor what he expects to make, the company will put an end to it. I understand that a similar provision is to be found in very many of the charters which have been granted to these companies, and that it has been found not to act prejudicially. It appears to me, however, to be a very unjust provision.

Mr. HOWARD. I look upon it, with great deference to the opinion of others, as a very essential provision to be contained in this charter. I think it will be promotive of the interests of the company and of the public; but I will not spend any time in discussing it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is the same proposition that we discussed at length the other day and voted upon and voted it out of the bill. I am so anxious to get a vote on this bill and action on it to-night that I will take up no time; but we discussed this matter at considerable length; I think it is a one-sided arrangement, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 14, noes 17.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays. ["It is too late."] It is a very important amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senate has twice voted it down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

Several SENATORS. It is too late.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will entertain the call.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the Senate adjourn. If we are to have the yeas and nays and various other amendments we cannot get through.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope we shall not adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that will not be done. The Senator from Connecticut seems to have done this—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not a debatable question.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand that.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to say just one word before a vote is taken on this proposition. I have given some little attention to charters that are granted to corporations, and I have never known so extraordinary a provision as this. Any man that takes a contract—

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will permit me, I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the call can be withdrawn only by unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANDLER. I renew it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was not speaking about the Senator's call for the yeas and nays. That was a matter of entire indifference to me. I would have called for the yeas and nays myself.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator will pardon me. I supposed that the withdrawal would gratify the Senator and that would be the end of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not understand the Chair to decide that the proposition was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I misunderstood the decision of the Senator from California, and I withdraw the remark about the yeas and nays being called. I suppose the Senate of course will not change its views, and I do not feel it necessary to discuss it further.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Elihu, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Pomeroy, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, and Wilkinson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Clark, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Powell, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hick, Nesmith, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Sherman, Wilson, and Wright—19.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer this amendment, to come in at the end of section fourteen:

But all lands shall be excluded from the operation of this section, and of the act to which this is an amendment, which were located or selected to be located under the provisions of an act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, and notice thereof given at the proper land office.

Mr. HOWARD. There is no objection to that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not see any object in it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILKINSON. I want to offer some additional sections to the bill.

Mr. FOOT. I suggest that had better come in as an independent amendment. It is not necessarily an amendment to the pending amendment, and the question may as well be taken now on the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. That will not interfere with the offering of this amendment as additional sections afterwards.

Mr. WILKINSON. Then I withdraw this amendment for the present.

The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. WILKINSON. Now I offer my amendment. It is not necessary that it should be read. It is to change the routes of certain railroads in Minnesota. It grants no lands. It has passed the Senate; and the reason why I propose to put it upon this bill is that I am fearful the proposition may not pass as an independent measure in the House of Representatives.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope it will not be put on here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

Mr. FOOT. The mover suggests it is not necessary to read it. After his explanation I presume it is not. The great objection is its incongruity to the whole bill. It cannot be ruled out of order; but it is good reason for voting against it.

Mr. WILKINSON. I admit it has no particular relation to this bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I really hope my friend will withdraw his amendment. It is not congruous to the bill itself, and I think he does not want to embarrass the bill and consume time by it.

Mr. WILKINSON. I withdraw it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. TEN EYCK called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Willey—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Hendricks, Powell, Saulsbury, and Ten Eyck—5.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a joint resolution (No. 81) amendatory of the joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports, approved April 29, 1864; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a resolution to terminate the present session of Congress by an adjournment on the 6th day of June next at twelve o'clock meridian.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 74) referring the claim of J. H. Clark & Co. to the Court of Claims; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives (No. 81) amendatory of the joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports, approved April 29, 1864, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to establish a Bureau of Freedmen.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not until my motion is put. I only want my bill taken up.

Mr. POWELL. I am opposed to taking up that bill. If we want to take up any bill let it be the bill to prevent military interference with elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 10, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONNESS. On the motion to take up the bill referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote just taken discloses no quorum present, and therefore no business is in order.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. POWELL. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent members.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before putting that motion, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. I give notice that to-morrow as early as possible I shall move to proceed to the consideration of the bill I have mentioned.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, May 23, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. Hosmer, of Buffalo, New York.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

PAY OF MESSRS. SEGAR, CHANDLER, KITCHEN.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I report back, from the Committee of Elections, the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Joseph Segar, Lucius H. Chandler, and B. M. Kitchen, claimants of seats in this House as Representatives from Virginia, each the usual mileage of a member for one session, and the monthly pay from the commencement of the session till the passage of the resolution in each case declaring them not entitled to a seat.

The resolution was referred to the committee for the purpose of ascertaining the fact of Mr. Chandler's holding an office under the United States Government during the time for which the resolution proposes to pay him. The fact in that respect is that Mr. Chandler is a district attorney of the United States. I understand that as such he does not receive a salary, but is paid by fees which he receives from time to time, and whether his compensation from fees amounts to as much as $2,500 per annum I am unable to state. The law on the subject, which would prevent an officer receiving a salary of as much as $2,500 per annum from receiving pay for any other office, is as follows:

"No person hereafter who holds or shall hold any office under the Government of the United States whose salary or annual compensation shall amount to the sum of $2,500, shall receive compensation for discharging the duties of any other office."

The case contemplated by the law is where the person receives an annual compensation, and therefore does not include the case of Mr. Chandler, and it is merely a question of propriety whether under the circumstances Mr. Chandler shall have this compensation for the time spent and expenses incurred in the prosecution of his claim to a seat on this floor as a Representative from the State of Virginia. It does not come within the provision of the statute, and whether or not the House will vote him this compensation is of course for the House to decide. The compensation provided in the resolution is the monthly pay of a member—$250—from the commencement of the session until the resolution passed, and mileage for one session. The mileage in this case is very small.

I will say further, with the permission of the House, that the other two gentlemen whose names are mentioned in the resolution, Mr. Segar and Mr. Kitchen, have suffered very severely at the hands of the rebels. They are represented by their friends, and I have no doubt correctly, to be in very necessitous circumstances.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand this resolution to embrace the three cases?

Mr. DAWES. It does.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts whether it would not be better to separate these cases and allow the vote to be taken upon that of Mr. Chandler by itself. I understand Mr. Chandler has, during this whole time, been receiving a per diem compensation, and certainly the same reasons do not apply in his case as apply to the other cases. I therefore suggest that the cases be separated.

Mr. DAWES. I will say that the committee reported back the resolution without any recommendation at all. I desire to leave the matter entirely with the House, and have therefore no objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that Mr. Chandler has been receiving his compensation as district attorney during the whole time covered by this resolution.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chandler has been district attorney since July last, and as such has received the fees to which he was entitled. What amount of business he has done I am unable to say. The business would be very small outside his fees connected with confiscation cases. How much he may have done in that respect I do not know.

Mr. HOLMAN. One question further. He is still holding the same official position. Therefore, for the purpose of getting the subject before the House, I will, with the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts, modify the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out so much of the resolution as applies to Mr. Chandler; and I desire to state my reason for that modification. He holds an official position under the Government, and the chairman of the Committee of Elections is not able to state the extent of his compensation. He holds an office of profit and trust which does not bring him within the law read by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I therefore suggest, to avoid complicating this case, and inasmuch as they stand upon a different footing, that we take the vote on Mr. Chandler's proposition by itself.

Mr. DAWES. While I think that there is a propriety in making a distinction between these gentlemen, still if we strike out the name of Mr. Chandler it may not be within our power to bring his case before the House again.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is difficult to modify the resolution so as to accomplish the object. The modification ought to be to put Mr. Chandler upon the same compensation of $250 per month, deducting the amount he may have received in his capacity of assistant district attorney of Virginia. It has been suggested to pay Mr. Chandler only mileage. That may do him injustice. These gentlemen ought to stand upon the same footing. I therefore move to strike out Mr. Chandler's name, and at the end of the resolution to add the following words:

That we pay to Mr. Chandler the same compensation provided for the other gentlemen of $250 per month and mileage, deducting therefrom the amount he may have received as assistant district attorney of the United States for Virginia.

That can be ascertained officially.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman from Indiana intend that he shall pay over the balance?

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman has any doubt that he has received a compensation beyond this amount, then it is proper to strike out the name of Mr. Chandler.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to say what the fees have amounted to which Mr. Chandler has received since he has been in office; but I do know the fact that the district attorney of West Virginia some five or six months ago was determined to resign because the fees received from his office would not support him and pay his traveling expenses. I feel quite certain that the fees which Mr. Chandler now receives are merely nominal.

Mr. WILSON. I think that the gentleman is entirely mistaken about the amount of compensation received by Mr. Chandler. The gentleman refers to the amount received by the district attorney in West Virginia. That is no criterion for determining Mr. Chandler's case, for the gentleman must remember that the district court of West Virginia has not been as active under the confiscation act as the district court of Virginia. I understand from statements which satisfy my mind that the compensation of Mr. Chandler as assistant district attorney of Virginia, has been enormously large. I will not state the precise sum stated to me, but I believe I shall be perfectly safe in saying that he has received during the last year $10,000. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana ought to be adopted.

My attention has been called to the fact by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] that, in accordance with the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, the compensation allowed to district attorneys under the confiscation act is not included in the $6,000 limit of the amount to be retained by district attorneys as compensation under the general law.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. The gentleman from Iowa is mistaken when he says that the courts in West Virginia have not been as vigilant in regard to confiscation as other courts.

Mr. WILSON. What I said was that it was not as active in relation to confiscated property as the court at Alexandria.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. Well, I do not know. There has been a great deal of criminal business in our State; men are brought up upon various charges and the courts have to sit days and weeks hearing complaints against men who are supposed to be in sympathy with the rebellion. For all this the attorney gets nothing, and it is only in confiscation cases and in cases where the parties are convicted that he receives anything. I think the district attorney of the district of West Virginia has done as much and perhaps more than the district attorney of Virginia.

This compensation is not designed as a salary, but to compensate this man for the trouble and expense he has been to in seeking his rights before this House. And what would it be? All he could get under the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana would be but a drop in the bucket. It would not pay his board while he has been here. This House, in my judgment, committed a great wrong when it deprived him of a seat, and I trust they will not now add to it an insult by refusing to pay the pitiful allowance mentioned in this resolution, and to which he is as much entitled as is Mr. Segar.

Mr. WILSON. During most of the time that Mr. Chandler's case has been before the committee and the House he has been attending to his duties as district attorney of the United States district court at Alexandria. His compensation as such has been going on all the time, and it has been enormously large during the last year.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. It has been going on only so far as the fees of the office are concerned. When he could be relieved from attending to his case here, of course he was attending to his duties at Alexandria, or at any other place where they called him. He would not be a good officer did he not do so. I hope, therefore, this House will not make a distinction between him and his colleague, but pay him the same mileage and per diem.

I am as much in favor of strict economy as any gentleman in this House, especially in times like the present; but when we come down to a small matter of this kind, and deprive a man of the little compensation which belongs to him, I think we are descending below our dignity.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire to make a practical observation. Mr. Chandler, as I understand, holds an office under the United States. If the House had voted him into his seat he could not have drawn a cent of his salary before the day of his admission; and after that, of course, he would be obliged to renounce the other office before he could hold a seat in this House. Therefore the proposition is, because he failed, to give something which, if he had succeeded, he could not have received.

Mr. DAWES. There is a difficulty in fixing a general rule, as has been said, for the reason that in the different cases there is a great difference in the time necessary to be spent, and in the expenses to be incurred in taking depositions, in traveling over a large district to examine into the case, and in prosecuting the cases before the House. Some cases require a great deal of time and expense, while some cases require but little. It is difficult to say that you will pay each man a fixed sum according to a general rule, for while that does not fully compensate some men it more than compensates others. Therefore it is proper that we should look into the circumstances of each particular case.

Now, if we propose to take a portion of the compensation given to Mr. Chandler, and divide it between Mr. Segar and Mr. Kitchen, I think it would be doing greater justice than to vote to each one of them the same sum, for the reason I have stated. There is the further reason that Mr. Chandler held an office under the United States. I think the proposed compensation is rather small for Mr. Segar and Mr. Kitchen, while under the circumstances it is quite enough for Mr. Chandler. I think Mr. Chandler should have a small compensation for the time and money expended in this behalf. However, I shall not oppose the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, provided I can see the way clear for giving Mr. Chandler some smaller compensation than the others.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the resolution is in accordance with the rule which the House adopted the other day, and which the House affirmed. I think we must have some general rule. Men who are contesting seats are supposed to be here from the commencement of the session until the contest is terminated. We know, in point of fact, that they are not. I suppose Mr. Kitchen was not, and Mr. Segar may not have been; but they came here to contest their right to a seat. If they went away and came back three or four times before we were ready to try their cases, are they to be paid mileage, or when they come on must they stay all the time? I see a difficulty in making any distinction between them. Suppose Mr. Segar to have had some other trade; suppose him to have been a blacksmith and Mr. Kitchen a shoemaker—I hope they will not be offended at the supposition, for I know they are not in those trades—and suppose that while waiting here during the winter to have their cases decided, instead of being idle, they chose to be industrious and earn some little at their trades, either at home or here, are we to inquire how much they earned and deduct it from their per diem? We might just as well do that as to inquire into the professional earnings of a man who happened to take up a case while waiting for his own case to be decided. It is suggested the adoption of such a rule would be a premium on idleness. You would keep men claiming seats in this House lying around idle all the time.

I think, therefore, that we cannot do better than to pass the resolution as it was reported by the Committee of Elections. I think this thing of inquiring into a man's private business because he did not choose to be round here while his case was pending would be a bad precedent, for if we followed it out it would be exceedingly delicate in some cases that had better not be examined into. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. DAWES. I now call the previous question.

Mr. A. MYERS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. This resolution proposes to pay these gentlemen from the beginning of the session. I want to know if that means from the 4th of March last or from the first Monday in December?

Mr. DAWES. The first Monday in December.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, being first upon Mr. HOLMAN's amendment.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia, demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays. Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was agreed to—yeas 58, noes 37.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 60; nays 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Arnold, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Brooks, Brownell, William G. Brown, Cobb, Coffroth, Cravens, Dawes, Eckley, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Herrick, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McClurg, McDowell, McIndoe, Moorhead, James R. Rollins, Schenck, Smithers, Spalding, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Sweat, Williams, Windom, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—57.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, informed the House that he had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 251) to organize a regiment of veteran volunteer engineers;

An act (H. R. No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 72) relative to pay of staff officers of the Lieutenant General;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) relating to Green Clay Goodloe; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 78) providing for the election of a member of Congress for the State of Illinois by the State at large.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. COFFROTH offered, as a privileged question, the following resolution, and moved the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the present session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress be adjourned on the 6th of June next, at twelve o'clock meridian.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the resolution was adopted.

Mr. COFFROTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the business next in order, to call upon committees for reports, to be referred to the Committee of the Whole, and not to be brought back on motions to reconsider, commencing with the Committee of Elections.

JOHN WARREN AND SON.

Mr. LONG, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of John Warren & Son; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES F. ANDERSON.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (S. No. 207) for the relief of Charles F. Anderson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

CALL OF STATES.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the business next in order during the continuation of the morning hour, to call the States and Territories for resolutions, commencing with the Territory of Idaho.

SETTLEMENTS UNDER PREEMPTION LAWS.

Mr. COLE, of Washington, introduced a bill to provide for the payment of certain claims to lands within the limits of the Indian reservations in Washington Territory, arising under the preemption laws and donation act, in consequence of preemptions and settlements made prior to the establishment of such reservations; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

DUTY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. KINNEY offered the following resolution, and moved the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, (as the sense of this House,) That the present crisis in the history of this causeless and unjustifiable rebellion calls loudly upon Congress for united patriotic legislation; that while our gallant and self-sacrificing soldiers are, with a courage unexampled either in ancient or modern warfare, sustaining the honor of the nation in the field, they are entitled to the thanks of the country and the hearty support of Congress; and, forgetting for the present all differences upon old party issues, it is the duty of Congress to sustain the constituted authorities of the country in their efforts to suppress the rebellion.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the resolution was unanimously adopted.

RAILROAD GRANT TO MINNESOTA.

Mr. DONNELLY introduced a bill making an additional grant of lands to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of railroads from Stillwater, by way of St. Paul and St. Anthony, to a point between Big Stone lake and the mouth of Sioux Wood river, with a branch to St. Cloud, and to the navigable waters of the Red River of the North, as the Legislature may determine; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

TRANSMISSION OF MAILS.

Mr. SLOAN introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report a bill authorizing any person or corporation to carry letters and other mailable matter between all places where it now generally requires double the time to transmit letters by mail that it requires to transport passengers by the ordinary public conveyances, and to receive compensation therefor.

Mr. ALLEY. I suggest to the mover of the resolution to modify it so as simply to instruct the committee to inquire into the expediency of reporting such a bill.

Mr. SLOAN. I have no objection.

The resolution having been so modified was adopted.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. PRICE introduced a bill granting public lands to aid in the construction of a branch Union Pacific railroad and telegraph line through the mineral lands of the Territories of Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona; which was read a first and second time, referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad, and ordered to be printed.

SUSPENSION OF NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. GRINNELL. I submit the following resolution, and demand the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House whether by any order of the Government, or by any officer thereof, the World and Journal of Commerce, newspapers in the city of New York, were suspended from being published; and if so, that said order be communicated to this House, and the proceedings in the execution of that order.

The SPEAKER. That being a resolution requesting information, can only be considered on this day by unanimous consent.

A MEMBER objected.

Mr. GRINNELL. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has already gone over for one day.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution, and on its adoption demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That hereafter, until otherwise ordered, this House will meet at eleven o'clock, a. m., for the transaction of business.

Mr. PENDLETON. Does not that change one of the rules of the House, and therefore must it not go over for one day?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The Chair will have the rule read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"1. He shall take the chair, every day, precisely at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned on the preceding day."

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for the gentleman to answer why he desires the House to meet at eleven o'clock. The Senate are behind us in business, and I see no reason for this resolution.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I have demanded the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 93, noes 20.

FEES OF MARSHALS, ETC., ON THE PACIFIC.

Mr. COLE, of California, submitted the following resolution, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That it shall be lawful for United States district attorneys and United States marshals in the States of California and Oregon to charge and receive for the services they may perform double the fees and emoluments allowed to like officers in the southern district of New York for similar services.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EAST VIRGINIA CIRCUIT COURT.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for holding a session of the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Virginia at Alexandria.

FORGERY OF OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ARNOLD submitted the following resolution, on the adoption of which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report what, if any, additional legislation may be necessary to punish the forgery and publication of official documents, and what legislation is necessary to punish those who through the press or otherwise give information, aid, or comfort to the rebels.

Mr. COX. I would like to amend that resolution.

The SPEAKER. A motion to amend is not in order pending the demand of the previous question.

Mr. COX. I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his demand for the previous question.

Mr. ARNOLD. It is a mere resolution for information. I insist upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX. If it is merely a resolution for information it must go over one day under the rule, but I desire to amend it so as to direct the committee also to inquire what suitable pains and penalties should be inflicted upon subordinates of the Government who arrest proprietors of newspapers and suspend the publication of their papers.

Mr. ARNOLD. That may come in as a separate resolution. I insist upon my demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and ARNOLD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 49.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ARNOLD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EVACUATION OF CUMBERLAND GAP.

Mr. COX submitted the following resolution, and on its adoption demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to answer the former resolution of this House, and transmit a copy of the report of General George W. Morgan in relation to the evacuation of Cumberland Gap, &c.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired.

Mr. COX. I have demanded the previous question on my resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's resolution goes over till Monday next.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I call for the regular order of business.

SUSPENSION OF NEW YORK NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. PRUYN. Before the regular order of business is called for, I ask the gentleman from Maryland to allow me to submit a resolution to the House in behalf of the New York delegation on this side of the House, and perhaps to some extent on the other, which we regard of great importance. I ask that the resolution may be read for information.

Mr. GRINNELL. If the gentleman will allow the resolution that I have offered to come in, I will not offer any objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the resolution of the gentleman from New York will be allowed to be read.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I do not object to the resolution being read for information.

Mr. PRUYN. Before the resolution is read I would like to say further on behalf of my associates that with the kind permission of the House I shall beg to say a few words in explanation of the reasons which have induced us to present this resolution. I pledge myself, if that permission be granted, not to occupy but a very few minutes. I ask that the resolution be read.

The Clerk then read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the conduct of the executive authority of the Government in recently closing the offices and suppressing the publication of the World and Journal of Commerce, newspapers in the city of New York, under circumstances which have been placed before the public, was an act unwarranted in itself, dangerous to the cause of the Union, in violation of the Constitution, and subversive of the principles of civil liberty, and as such is hereby censured by this House.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, and other members objected.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The reason why I will not yield to the gentleman from New York to offer that resolution is that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] submitted a resolution of inquiry on the same subject, and it was objected to from that side of the House. I now ask that my resolution be read.

Mr. COX. I will say to the gentleman from Maryland that if there was any objection on this side of the House to the resolution of the gentleman from Iowa it will be withdrawn, provided you will give us an opportunity to amend it. All we want is to obtain the facts for the people, and to express our censure of this cowardly and base attempt to suppress the freedom of the press.

FRENCH IN MEXICO.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask the Clerk to read my resolution.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Whereas the following announcement appeared in the Moniteur, the official journal of the French Government:

"Le gouvernement de l'Empereur a reçu du gouvernement des Etats-Unis des explications satisfaisantes sur le sens et la portée de la résolution prise par l'Assemblée des représentants à Washington, au sujet des affaires du Mexique."

"On sait, d'ailleurs, que le Sénat avait déjà ajourné indéfiniment l'examen de cette résolution, à laquelle, dans tous les cas, le pouvoir exécutif n'eût point accordé sa sanction."—Moniteur.

"It is known, besides, that the Senate had indefinitely postponed the examination of that question, to which in any case the executive power would not have given its sanction."

Therefore, Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not inconsistent with the public interest, any explanations given by the Government of the United States to the Government of France respecting the sense and bearing of the joint resolution relative to Mexico, which passed the House of Representatives unanimously on the 4th of April, 1864.

Mr. SWEAT. I object.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose I have indicated.

Mr. DAWSON. I hope there will be no objection to the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. SWEAT. At the first reading of the resolution I did not have the same understanding of it that I do now, and I therefore withdraw my objection.

Mr. COBB. I renew the objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move that the rules be suspended.

Mr. ARNOLD. I rise to a question of order. I make the point that this is a call for information on one of the Executive Departments, and must under the rules lie over for one day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland moves to suspend that and all other rules.

Mr. COX. I suggest to the gentleman from Maryland that the resolution might be enlarged to include all the correspondence relative to the subject.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I think that the resolution covers the ground.

The rules were suspended.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a joint resolution amendatory of the joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports approved April 29, 1864, which was read a first and second time.

The resolution was read in extenso, as follows:

Whereas a joint resolution of Congress to increase temporarily the duties on imports was approved by the President on the 29th of April; at thirty minutes past seven o'clock, p. m., but was not promulgated until the day following, to wit, April 30, 1864: Therefore,

Resolved, That the resolution shall not be deemed to have taken effect until the said 30th day of April, 1864; and the said resolution shall not be construed to include goods in public store or bonded warehouse, or bonded for warehousing or transportation prior to the said 30th day of April, 1864; and any duties which shall have been exacted and received contrary to the provisions of this resolution shall be refunded by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. STEVENS. I have merely to say that upon consultation with the Treasury Department I ascertained that although the Secretary felt bound by the decision of the Supreme Court which would hold this resolution operative on Friday, although no one had notice of it, and it was not signed until half past seven o'clock in the evening, yet he thought it unjust, and desires to have it amended accordingly. Many merchants who paid that day at the old rates have been called upon to pay according to the new rates, which are fifty per cent. in advance of the old. I look upon that as evidently unjust; and the Secretary looks upon it in the same way.

Mr. BROOKS. I am glad the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania has introduced that resolution, as a matter of justice to the country, and especially to the importers of the city of New York, which I in part represent. But permit me to remark that this resolution only shows the perilous mode in which this House does business. We do a thing one Monday with great rapidity, and we have to undo it on the next Monday. I am very glad that this legislation is being undone.

Mr. STEVENS. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for the purpose of having it printed and recommitteed.

The bill was read by its title, as follows: "A bill granting land to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget sound on the Pacific coast by the northern route."

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether that subject has been referred to the committee since they last reported—they being a select committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offered the bill as a member, and moves to have it referred to the committee.

Mr. WILSON. I understood the gentleman to say that he reported it, and moved to recommit it.

The SPEAKER. If he did, then it might not be in order.

Mr. STEVENS. The committee had before them two bills upon this subject.

The SPEAKER. Then they have the right.

Mr. WILSON. They have reported upon the two bills which were referred to them. They made up their report upon the two bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state also, that a bill has been referred to that committee today, and that would revive the committee. But the committee, is not discharged, because they state that they have under consideration several matters referred to them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays upon the motion to suspend the rules, and also tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The rules were suspended, and

Mr. STEVENS reported the bill, which was read a first and second time, and recommitteed to the committee.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitteed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

There being, on a division—yeas 31, noes 63, Mr. WILSON withdrew the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the bill may be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

The SPEAKER. A majority can order the printing.

The motion to print was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask leave of absence for two weeks for my colleague, Mr. NORTON, on account of ill health. I desire to say that he is paired with Mr. STUART.

Leave of absence was granted accordingly.

SUSPENSION OF NEWSPAPERS IN NEW YORK.

Mr. PRUYN. I move to suspend the rules in order to introduce the resolution which was submitted by me a few moments ago in reference to the World and the Journal of Commerce, and which was submitted by me in behalf of all my associates seated upon this side of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman to allow us to go to the consideration of the appropriation bill which we were upon Friday. It is of more importance.

Mr. PRUYN. I consider this subject of greater importance to the country than any other.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. PRUYN. I simply wish to ask leave of the House for a purpose which I will state. I beg leave to ask permission of the House, before the vote is taken on my motion to suspend the rules, not only for myself but for all my friends upon this side of the House who form a part of the New York delegation.

Mr. WILSON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks what the gentleman is saying is in the nature of debate.

Mr. PRUYN. I say on behalf of myself and others, and they could not all rise.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in the nature of debate.

Mr. PRUYN. I ask leave of the House to present to the House very briefly the reasons which have led me to present the resolution, and then I will ask leave to offer it.

Mr. WILSON, and Mr. DAVIS of Maryland, objected.

Mr. PRUYN. I move, then, that the rules be suspended to enable me to offer the resolution.

Mr. KERNAN demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. PRUYN. I ask leave of the House to print the remarks I intended to make in behalf of myself and my associates.

Mr. WILSON. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I see no objection to his printing them in any of the New York papers. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRUYN. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion.

Mr. KERNAN. We want them in the Globe, for the New York papers may be suppressed.

Ninetieth amendment:

Under the heading of the "Metropolitan Police" strike out "for salaries and other necessary expenses of the metropolitan police for the District of Columbia, $110,000," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

For salaries of superintendent, sergeants of police, and police patrolmen, $62,900, and that the salaries of said superintendent, sergeants, and police patrolmen are hereby increased twenty per cent., and that one half of the salaries and other necessary expenses of the metropolitan police, provided for in the act entitled "An act to create a metropolitan police district of the District of Columbia, and to establish a police therefor," approved August 6, 1861, and in this act, are hereby imposed upon and shall be borne by, after the 30th day of June next, the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county of Washington, and in the following proportion, to wit: the city of Washington twelve fifteenths, the city of Georgetown two fifteenths, and the county of Washington one fifteenth.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence in the Senate amendment, with the following amendment:

Strike out all of said Senate amendment to be inserted after the word "salaries" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And other necessary expenses of the metropolitan police for the District of Columbia, $110,000; and the compensation of said metropolitan police force, officers and clerks, be, and the same is hereby, increased fifty per cent., commencing on the 1st of July, 1864, said increase to be borne by the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, in the proportion equal to the number of patrolmen allotted severally to the city of Washington, to the city of Georgetown, and the county of Washington, beyond the limits of said cities. And the corporation authorities of said cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the levy court of said county, be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to levy a special tax not exceeding one quarter of one percent. for the purpose aforesaid.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Ways and Means proposes by the amendment reported to the Senate amendment to increase the pay of the metropolitan police fifty per cent., and to impose the payment of that additional amount on the corporations of Washington county, Washington city, and Georgetown city. The policy of increasing this pay twenty per cent. as proposed by the Senate, or fifty per cent. as proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, is the main question involved here. Probably some member of the Committee of Ways and Means can give the House a good reason for the proposition.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. The present pay of the metropolitan police is forty dollars per month; and the appropriation of $110,000 is only to pay them at that rate. The increase of fifty per cent. will fix their pay at sixty dollars per month. Every gentleman here knows that even sixty dollars a month is too small a compensation for these men. I would be in favor of increasing their present pay one hundred per cent.—the increase to be levied on the citizens.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman inform the House as to the number of persons employed in the metropolitan police?

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I cannot say exactly. Their annual compensation is only $480, while we are paying the Capitol police from eleven to twelve hundred dollars a year. Certainly the increase recommended is not unreasonable.

Mr. HOLMAN. The argument which the gentleman from Iowa suggests is the usual argument urged in increasing salaries. By some means or other through political partiality the salary of some officer is raised, and that is made the ground of argument of raising the salaries of other officers; because, unfortunately and improperly, the salaries of one set of policemen were raised from $600 to $1,320 it seems to me is no argument for increasing the salary of all policemen in the District, especially while so large a portion of our people, and certainly the most meritorious part, are employed at a compensation of only thirteen dollars per month, and, taking into consideration the rations they receive, not more than twenty dollars per month. And now that it has been increased to sixteen dollars per month, with the rations, makes only twenty-four dollars per month. While the Government is struggling for its life it seems to me that gentlemen ought not to insist on this increase of compensation to these policemen. You have increased the pay of your soldiers from thirteen dollars to sixteen dollars per month, and here the House proposes to increase the pay of these men, who perform not military but merely police services, fifty per cent. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana certainly well knows that the members of the metropolitan police live in Washington, and probably most of them are renters; and he knows from what he pays for his room or suite of rooms that the police officers who get but forty dollars a month, out of which they have to pay house-rent and buy provisions at a rate at which butter at sixty cents a pound is an example, cannot support their families on any such pay. If I could have my way I would make the increase one hundred per cent. and provide that the additional salary should be paid by the cities of Washington and Georgetown and adjoining county. We know that there is no city in the United States where the citizens pay so little taxes as do the people of Washington.

I understand when the Senate struck out the original appropriation of $110,000 which passed this House and inserted $62,000 in place of it, it was with the understanding and expectation that a like sum was to be raised by the people of these cities and county for that purpose. The proposition now is to retain the original appropriation of $110,000 and to require $55,000 additional to be raised by these cities and county.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there any good reason why the entire expenses should not be borne by the people here?

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me to answer the question? This increase was to be added at the expense of the citizens of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, they agreeing and desiring that it should be done. The Government does not pay one dollar of the proposed increase.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to submit an amendment to the amendment now pending. I move to amend by striking out the appropriation for the metropolitan police, leaving their compensation to be paid by the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county of Washington.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. In reply to the question asked me by the gentleman from Indiana, why any portion of this sum should be paid by the Government, I will say that the Government owns nearly one half of the real estate of the city of Washington—the proportion being that of $30,000,000 to $34,000,000—and it seems to me that they should bear their proportion of the expenses of the city, and especially when Congress has under the Constitution the exclusive legislation for the District. The gentleman will remember too that this police was, in the first instance, provided for by Congress at the expense of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. The suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, with the fact that this subject has already been before the House, leads me to decline to submit any proposition with a hope of its being adopted. I will modify my amendment by striking out "fifty" and inserting "twenty." I am opposed to any increase of these salaries.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. Does the gentleman from Indiana think that the police of this city are necessary?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. They cannot actually go on, they cannot live, unless they are paid more than they are now paid.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, we heard a great deal of virtuous indignation at an early day of the session in reference to the increase of salaries. It was stated again and again, by gentlemen on this and the other side of the House, that during the existing vast pressure upon the finances of the country there should be no increase of salaries. The compensation of the soldiers was not increased, upon the score of economy, until we passed a bill providing for a severe taxation of the country. Then as soon as that measure was adopted—

Mr. BEAMAN. I presume that the gentleman from Indiana will at least offer an amendment to give those policemen rations. There can, I think, be no objection to that, because the soldier gets his rations.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would the police consent to receive the same rations as soldiers? I do not think that they would be willing to receive the same pay and rations. They do not incur the hardships and perils incident to the field; still if they are willing to receive sixteen dollars a month and the rations of our soldiers I do not know that I will object to it. The soldiers of our Army possess the same capacity for public affairs as the police or any men in any other department of the public service, and yet, in this great struggle, we are constantly making this discrimination against the stalwart men who are defending our public liberty. Are not their services and danger entitled to as much compensation?

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I ask the gentleman this question. Because we cheat and plunder our soldiers, is that any reason why we should not pay a fair compensation to other persons?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not indulging in any such argument. The argument the gentleman offers is like that of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MORRIS,] that because we pay certain policeman $1,300 a year, therefore we must increase the pay of these policemen from forty dollars a month to sixty dollars. This comparative reasoning is always fallacious. I say we ought not to increase any salaries at the present time. The condition of the country will not admit of it. That such is the impression on the mind of the House appears by the paltry increase of the pay of the rank and file of our Army.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. This increase of fifty per cent. is asked for by the people of the cities of Washington and Georgetown and of the county of Washington. They propose to tax themselves to pay the increase.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the Senate amendment do that very thing?

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. One hundred and ten thousand dollars was the original sum reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, but the Senate struck it out. It is the sum which has been heretofore appropriated. The amendment proposes to allow Washington and Georgetown to increase the pay fifty per cent. They ask to pay it themselves, and I do not see how there can be any objection to so reasonable a proposition. The people are willing to tax themselves to pay these policemen fifty per cent. more than they now get, because they know that they cannot live on their present compensation, that they cannot keep their families and pay their rents.

Mr. HOLMAN. I modify my amendment so as to strike out all that relates to the fifty per cent. increase.

Mr. HOLMAN's amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means was agreed to; and the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Ninety-first amendment:

Insert after the word "buildings," in the deficiency appropriation for Capitol police, the words "to be paid only to loyal men."

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Ninety-second amendment:

Insert the following:
For salary of warden of jail in the District of Columbia, $1,600.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Ninety-third amendment:

Insert the following:
Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the office of the Treasurer of the United States be reorganized, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, so as to authorize the employment of the officers and clerks, and with the annual salaries hereinafter specified, viz:

One Assistant Treasurer, with a salary of $2,800.
One cashier, with a salary of $2,800; one assistant cashier, with a salary of $2,500; one chief of the division of issues, with a salary of $2,200; one chief of the division of redemption, with a salary of $2,200; one chief of the division of loans, with a salary of $2,200; one chief of the division of accounts, with a salary of $2,200; one chief of the division of national banks, with a salary of $2,200; two principal book-keepers, each with a salary of $2,200; two tellers, each with a salary of $2,200; two assistant tellers, each with a salary of $2,000; one chief clerk, with a salary of $2,000; fifteen clerks of class four, fifteen of class three, eleven of class two, nine of class one, one messenger in charge of mails, with a salary of $1,000; nine messengers, with a salary of $900 each; five messengers, with a salary of $700 each; sixty female clerks, with a salary of $600 each; five laborers, with a salary of $600 each; and seven female laborers, at a salary of $240 each. And the officers, clerks, and employees hereby authorized shall be in lieu of all the force now employed in the said office. And the amount necessary to pay the salaries of said officers, clerks, and employees, in addition to the amount heretofore provided for the present fiscal year, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be observed that no definite amount is appropriated by this section, and there is no estimate for it. It is only one of those instances in which a radical change is made not only in the number of public officers but in their compensation, and for which no Department can be held responsible in consequence of there being no open recommendation of the change and no estimate at all for the appropriation of the public money resulting from the change. I understand that all these different offices named here were offices unknown at the time the annual estimates were sent to Congress. The people of this country can never know anything of the extent of their expenditures if they look only to appropriations, for the simple reason that large appropriations are made independent of the estimates, and at the same time you hold no Department responsible for the expenditure. You have estimates laid upon the table, and you inform the country that they are the real estimate of expenditures; but before the proper bill is finally passed, item after item, appropriating hundreds of thousands of dollars, are added, for which Congress alone is responsible, and Congress ordinarily gives the matter but little consideration.

I should like to have the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means give the House to understand to what extent there is an increase in this clerical force, and of these heads of divisions, and the various employees enumerated in this amendment of a page and a half of the printed bill; how many were employed before, and how many it is proposed to employ now. I presume we shall have no information upon the subject. The House is acting in the dark upon the subject, and I presume no gentleman outside of the Committee of Ways and Means is aware of the number that have heretofore been employed, and what number is proposed to be employed hereafter by this amendment. We are acting upon no estimates and upon no recommendations, as far as I am informed. I object to acting upon amendments making appropriations of hundreds of thousands of dollars in reference to which no one outside of the Committee of Ways and Means can give us any information.

I think not a dollar should be appropriated except upon an estimate of the Department, and that there should be no increase in clerical force and heads of divisions, &c., without such a statement to the country and to Congress as will inform the whole people in what manner their money is being expended. But they will know nothing of this. In the midst of these tremendous expenditures, when the Treasury is so embarrassed, and our resources ought to be husbanded to the last extreme, while we will spend hours of time over partisan feuds, yet when the question affects the rights of the people and the expenditure of the money of the people, of which we should be the guardians, half a dozen men of the Ways and Means Committee are the only ones who have any information whatever upon the subject. I would like some member of the Committee of Ways and Means to explain the extent of this increased expenditure, and tell us what is the present clerical force and what the present number of heads of divisions, and also what increase is proposed by this amendment both in numbers and compensation. There is not the scratch of the pen, not a printed or written document from which gentlemen can obtain this information. I presume this measure will be adopted and these high salaries established, and then I suppose we will go home and tell our constituents in the midst of this great commotion we are unable to obtain the information upon which our expenditures are to be made, and deliberate properly on their affairs.

Gentlemen seem to be apprehensive of raising any question on the subject of expenses for fear of being called to account for "embarrassing the Administration" in the present state of public affairs. For one, as a Representative, and as the Representative of intelligent men, I will never consent to a change so radical as the one which is now proposed both in the number and pay of these employes without some knowledge of the data upon which we are called upon to act.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate, it was put; and there were—ayes 48, noes 18; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEVENS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs HOLMAN, and KELLOGG of New York, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 28.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Ninety-fourth amendment:

Add as an additional section:
Sec. — And be it further enacted, That from and after the present fiscal year the salary of the Treasurer of the United States shall be $6,000 per annum.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the present salary of the United States Treasurer is $5,000, and this is a proposition to increase it to $6,000. This proposition is a little bolder and plainer than the one we have just passed upon, for it proposes a definite increase of salary.

This proposition comes from a party that came into power on the pretense of an improper expenditure of the public money in extravagant salaries. They charged that the Buchanan administration would ruin the country by its extravagance and profligacy. And yet now, when the nation is bearing everything that a nation can bear, it proposes to increase these already too large salaries. This repudiation of economy is one of the most remarkable instances of a party abandoning and violating its pledges that this or any other country has ever seen.

I know that the gentleman who fills this office is one of the most sterling and faithful officers in the public service, and he is well paid for his services. Five thousand dollars a year is a very good compensation for that officer or any other. There is not, to use my old comparison, a humble soldier in the Army who has a musket on his shoulder who is not, in a free Republic like ours, entitled to just as much consideration and to just as much compensation for his services as a gentleman who spends his time in superintending the affairs of one of your bureaus.

The salary is now $5,000 and you propose to increase it to $6,000. As the nation grows poorer, and as the people more and more shrink and writhe under the burdens you are imposing upon them, in the same proportion you increase expenditure and enlarge salaries, and will presume to go to your constituents and advocate the continuance in power of a party that is wholly indifferent to the woe and misery which the tremendous public debt you are creating is heaping upon the shoulders of the toil and labor of this country.

Why, sir, since God created the heavens and the earth there has never been such a disregard of the expenditure of the public treasure for unnecessary purposes as is exhibited here. I saw, after we had been trying for four long months to increase the pay of the soldier from thirteen dollars to twenty dollars a month, how unwillingly gentlemen opposite approached the question, and now we shall see whether you will vote to increase this already sufficient salary and other salaries so high that they ought to command and would command the very best talent in the country; we shall see whether, for the purpose of increasing these salaries, you will impose additional burdens on the country.

I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon this proposition, and let us determine whether this is to be the steady policy of the party in power, whether there is to be no end or limit to the wonderful extravagance and profligacy which now pervade Congress in the disposal of the public money.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I sought an opportunity to respond to the remarks made by the gentleman from Indiana on the preceding amendment. I should have done it, and explained even to the satisfaction, I trust, of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN], if that were possible, the reasons for the amendment. Unfortunately, the papers were not then in my possession, and the vote was taken before I had an opportunity to explain. I cannot recur, therefore, to that subject now, except incidentally. I wish to say on the point now before the House that if there be one officer under this Government who earns his salary over and over and over again it is the Treasurer of the United States, a man whose life has been almost sacrificed, as is well known to many members, by his excessive labors during the past and present year.

Mr. HOLMAN. And the lives of a great many thousand soldiers have been sacrificed during the same time, who were receiving only thirteen dollars a month.

Mr. KASSON. That officer is not at this moment paid at the rate fixed by Democratic precedent for the salary of an officer of less importance than that of the Treasurer of the United States. The Assistant Treasurer at New York, an officer subordinate to him, has a salary of $6,000 a year, fixed by a Democratic Government at a time when the expense of living was hardly one half what it is at present, while millions upon millions of responsibility are accumulating in the office of the Treasurer of the United States here, in excess of that of the Assistant Treasurer in New York. The gentleman from Indiana having first introduced his harangue here (I beg his pardon for the phrase, I should say his speech) by the statement that we on this side of the House complained of high salaries, and by the further statement that we have been consuming time with buncombe speeches, rises on every one of these amendments—the only member who does so—and makes what every member of the House knows to be purely a buncombe speech, to be read in the country, and not intended to have any influence on the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, if I understand that remark, it is a little personal. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. I apply it in a political sense.

A MEMBER. The gentleman does it in a Pickwickian sense.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Iowa means to say that the remarks made by me on these amendments were not intended to influence the action of the House, he is laboring under a very great delusion. Did I understand the gentleman to say that my remarks here were not made in view of affecting the action of the House, but from other considerations?

Mr. KASSON. I made the remark that the speech was evidently calculated to be read elsewhere, and not to influence the action of the House, because the gentleman from Indiana made repeated allusion to our refusal to increase largely the pay of the Army at his own figures, which if done would make the expenses of prosecuting the war more than the Treasury could stagger under. Besides, Mr. Speaker, the country never can pay our soldiers for the work they are doing. Congress may vote them millions of additional pay, but it can never compensate them for the sacrifices they make, in exposing life and limb. The soldiers do not go to war for money. They go for their love of country. And if that gentleman and myself and all other members of this House would attend to our business with half the patriotic devotion that the soldiers exhibit, we would be far more in advance with the public business than we now are. But let me return to the subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say to the gentleman from Iowa—

Mr. KASSON. My time is short, and the gentleman must excuse me from yielding to him. I certainly would yield, only that my time is so very brief, and the gentleman from Indiana is on the floor so much.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has only one minute more.

Mr. KASSON. Then let me say this: we but propose to put the salary of the Treasurer at the same figure that is paid to the Assistant Treasurer at New York, as fixed by Democratic precedent in years gone by. His responsibility is vastly greater. His labors are vastly greater. He is entitled to some increase of salary, if only to furnish him with a premium to insure his life. His department is well managed. There are certain officers in the employment of the Government whose pay I would willingly increase to $10,000 rather than that the Government should lose their services. Some of these officers are perpetually being tempted to leave the service of the Government by offers made by banking-houses and other corporations. We must act justly toward these men. The Treasurer does not ask this increase, but it is our duty to give it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out "$6,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$5,000." Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say, very temperately, that when the gentleman from Iowa undertakes to arraign a member upon this floor the gentleman will remember for motives which influence his conduct he can convict but one person, and that person himself, of being ruled and controlled by such unworthy considerations.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me to say, if I have not already explained my remark—

Mr. HOLMAN. I cannot yield the floor. I understood the gentleman to say that he supposed, from the association and connection of the remarks that I made, that I made them not for the purpose of influencing this House, but for their effect upon the country. The gentleman was certainly not justified in making that remark. I have been in the habit of discussing questions before the House touching the public expenditure, and I acknowledge that during this session but very little attention has been given to anything that has been said when an appropriation of money was before us; but, sir, whatever remarks I have made have not been for the purpose of going to the country, but with the hope of influencing the action of the House. I acknowledge my failure in that regard. I am sensible that I have met with very little success. I have found it difficult to even get from a member of the Committee of Ways and Means information in reference to items of expenditure for which an appropriation was asked and not embraced in the estimates. I know that every proposition, however extravagant in

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 153.

its nature, calling for an appropriation of money for any purpose is almost certain to receive favor in this House to an extent never before known in the history of the country.

The condition of the country, the great financial distress into which we are bound to be precipitated, furnishes a reason to my mind why we ought to scrutinize every appropriation and hesitate before we appropriate one dollar, unless imperatively required.

I tell the gentleman from Iowa that when his side of the House shall see proper to encourage economy in the management of public affairs, instead of voting largely increased salaries; when they shall be ready to frown down this fearful extravagance in every branch of the public service, he may then claim for himself and his friends that their legislation is for the benefit of the men who are sacrificing life and everything for the country. The gentleman talks about not being able to pay the soldiers a higher rate of compensation. I hesitate to allude to that subject from the fact that whenever an allusion is made to it the motive is called in question, but I do say that if this House would present the same exhibition of economy in respect to everything else that they have done in respect to the pay of the soldiers, there would be money enough in the Treasury to enable us so largely to increase the pay of the soldier as might do something at least toward alleviating the sorrows and privations of his wife and children at home. But the gentlemen who are responsible for our legislation here, and who refuse to increase that pay beyond the pittance of sixteen dollars a month, are the gentlemen who resist every effort at economy in other expenditures, and who vote money without any examination and without any knowledge of the details or circumstances upon which such appropriations are sought to be obtained. I tell the gentlemen that every word which has been said upon this side of the House in favor of an increase of compensation to that most worthy class of our people who are sacrificing so much for our country has been influenced by no other consideration than an honest desire to afford them a reasonable compensation, for none deserve so much consideration as those who have so well performed their duty to the country.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman how he voted on Friday last on the Armes case, establishing a precedent which I undertake to say will take $500,000,000 out of the Treasury?

Mr. HOLMAN. I reply to the gentleman that inasmuch as the property in the case to which he refers was destroyed by military order by our own Army, and as the claimant was a loyal citizen, I voted with great pleasure to pay him for the property destroyed.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to make a single remark in reply to what fell from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] in regard to the danger of the Government losing the invaluable services of General Spinner unless we increase his salary to $6,000. For one, I confess to some curiosity on that point, and am anxious to see whether there is any good foundation for the apprehensions expressed by the gentleman from Iowa. I think there is no more unbecoming argument ever employed than one which is produced far too frequently in this House, to the effect that unless we instantly increase the pay of this or that officer the Government will lose his services. We are told, as we have been in this instance, that some banking association or railroad corporation will step in and bid higher, and thus deprive the Government of the services of an officer whose place cannot be made good. And this argument is seriously produced here with the view of influencing the vote of the House.

Now, sir, I have no doubt that General Spinner is a very excellent officer, and that he discharges his duties as Treasurer with great fidelity to the Government and with great credit to himself. But I do not believe at all, sir, in the existence of "indispensables;" and efficient as General Spinner is, I have no doubt that if he were to resign to-morrow his place could be made good in twenty-four hours. The northern cities abound with cashiers of great ability and large experience who would consider it a capital piece of fortune to be called to General Spinner's place at the present salary of $5,000. That salary, sir, is ample and very liberal, and a proposition to increase it seems to me like the merest wantonness of extravagance. I should far rather vote to take a thousand from it than to increase it a single dollar. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. NELSON. I move to reduce the amount to $4,000. I have, Mr. Speaker, some serious doubts on this question, although my disposition has been on the subject of men and money to vote liberally. The gentleman from Maine, who has preceded me, in the remarks which he made has taken the wind out of my sails. There is one idea, however, which he has not touched upon, and it is this: is the General Spinner, who holds this position, and whose services may be lost unless we increase his salary, the same General Francis E. Spinner referred to in the paragraph which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read?

The Clerk read, as follows:

Francis E. Spinner, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, during the Fremont campaign said:

"Should this [the election of Fremont] fail, no true man would be any longer safe here from the assaults of the arrogant slave oligarchy, who then would rule with an iron hand; for the free North would be left the choice of a dissolution of the Union, a civil war which would end in the same, or an unconditional surrender of every principle held dear by freemen."

Mr. NELSON. If it is put on the ground that the Fremont campaign having failed, officials are unsafe in Washington, I may be persuaded to increase his salary, because of the great risk which he runs. But I do not think that just now is the time to increase the salaries of officers who are already getting $5,000 a year. We need he under no apprehension of getting good men to fill these offices at that salary.

Mr. KELLEY. What is that book which is so often sent to the Clerk's desk?

Mr. NELSON. There is no use of yielding; I am through.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. It is not Anna Dickinson's last speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. As gentlemen will not give the authority they quote, will it be in order for the Clerk to inform us what the book is from which he has just read?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has not the right to speak in the House except through the Chair.

Mr. COX. I will tell the gentleman what it is. It is a collection of disunion speeches made by the gentleman's friends.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman does not give the title of the book; so many gross lies have been read from it that I would like to know its title. There is scarcely an extract read from it, from the present reading back to when it was sent to the desk by the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. Fernando Wood,] that is not replete with falsehood, assailing the character of some distinguished man; and I do not wonder that gentlemen are so averse to letting the title be known. Is it some private compilation, some book unpublished, that they are afraid to lay before the public? I again ask for the title of that collection of slanders on the patriots of the country.

Now, sir, another word. I have no fear that the people will fail to understand who are their friends and the friends of the country. They will scrutinize our votes on financial affairs, and they will not charge the heavy debt which gentlemen so frequently refer to upon the men who have borne the burden of this Government. They will know well where to saddle it. They will put it upon the men who have availed themselves of their position as members of this House to infuse hope into and to fire the energy of the rebel army, and who have spoken day after day words of comfort and inspiration to the leaders of the rebellion. They will saddle it upon the men who have endeavored to confine the dangers and burdens of the war to the white men of the North, and to keep them in our armies merely as armed police to prevent the laborers of the South from escaping from the service of their rebel masters. The gentlemen who say that it was wrong to enroll one hundred and thirty thousand stalwart negroes to help bear the brunt of this war must not come into this House and lecture us on expenditures and appeal to the people on account of the debt swollen by each day's expenditure made necessary by them. Wives and children have not only been burdened with debt, but have been made widows and orphans by reason of the fact that the gentleman and his colleagues have resisted the use of the strong arm of the negro, and it is not for him to go to these widows and orphans to talk with them about the dollars we are spending. They would spurn his suggestions, and say that their husbands and fathers had taught them to value country and honor more than dollars and cents.

Mr. NELSON. I think the gentlemen must be mistaken, for I believe this official is a white man. [Laughter.]

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. COX. I renew the amendment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania upon this occasion has seen proper to travel a little out of the ordinary course of debate for the purpose of attacking this side of the House generally. He thinks we have given certain aid and comfort to the rebellion in the South. I know, Mr. Speaker, we have not the same sort of record with the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania. Most of us upon this side of the House have not perhaps been out as he has—a soldier doing duty for the Republic. We have not done, as he has told us frequently, that he did—gloriously battled in behalf of this Government; but our friends have been there; our white friends have been there.

Mr. GARFIELD. Upon which side?

Mr. COX. Upon the side of the Government and the Constitution, and not upon the side of gentlemen who would "blow the Constitution to the winds," not on the side of gentlemen who would break down the only bond of union, like the gentleman from Ohio. Ay, we have been doing better service than the gentleman who interrupted me, for if I had time I would show that his boasted military exploits, so blazoned in the newspapers, would not even stand by the side of the eminent services of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] who acted as private in this great war against the rebellion.

I beg leave to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that this book, which was read from, is the "Logic of History," five hundred—

Mr. KELLEY. By the author of "The Buckeye Abroad?"

Mr. COX. Far more interesting and altogether more pertinent to the question before the House than "The Buckeye Abroad." And I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to an extract of a speech which is not but should be published here, a speech made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself. I wish I had the power to read it as he gave it to us; I wish I had the comic-tragic power with which he uttered it. [Laughter.] I send it to the Clerk's desk to be read in order that the gentleman may go down to history as one of the heroes whose services in this great war of rebellion entitles him to fling sneers and slang upon this side of the House. Let the Clerk read the first sentence.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"It was during that time that I lay down one night, carbine in hand, and gazed at the Milky Way with its innumerable myriads of stars."

Mr. COX. I would like to call the attention of the House to the gentleman from Pennsylvania lying upon his back out upon the borders of Pennsylvania gazing upon the Milky Way, looking up to that great cohort of stars, and drawing his inspiration thence for putting down this great rebellion! How insignificant are the services of my military colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] compared to this brilliant performance of the critical member from Pennsylvania!

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether this discussion is germane to the salary of an officer of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. Will the Clerk read a little further? I am replying to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was in response to some allusion made by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. And I am responding to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Why did not the Chair call him to order? The question is upon extracts, and I am presenting some beautiful ones.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not make the point himself if no one else objects.

Mr. COX. The Chair has taken up nearly all my five minutes. Read on.

The Clerk read:

"And while I thought of home and family, and of the folly of a man who, until then, had scarcely known how to handle the weapon he held, rushing to such a post, I also thought of the grandeur of my country and of its immense future."

Mr. COX. The Clerk cannot do justice to that extract. I would like the gentleman from Pennsylvania to speak it over again. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will give me the balance of his five minutes I will gratify him. [Cries of "Oh, no!" and "Order!"]

Mr. COX. I want it distinctly understood that the gentleman was lying on his back at the time. [Laughter.] Now, the Clerk will please read on.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"I felt, sir, that in this great struggle the life of the best loved or greatest of us all, or the sorrows of families, was no more in comparison with the cause than was the smallest star in all that immense multitude to the sun of the material universe."

Mr. COX. I want the House to understand that the gentleman was still upon his back, gazing upon the "milky way," and I want the Clerk to put a little more energy into his reading. [Laughter.]

The Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

"And I have felt since that time, that to secure the peace of this country I would sacrifice the lives of the grandest and most delicate by thousands, and of the powerful and muscular and least valuable by tens of thousands."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEVENS. Is it in order to move to close all further debate upon this amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move the previous question on the amendment of the Senate.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my amendment, and demand the yeas and nays on concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Arnold, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dixon, Eliot, Garfield, Griswold, Hotchkiss, Jencks, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Marvin, Melbridge, Meludoe, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Pendleton, Pomeroy, Robinson, Schenck, Smith, Stevens, Upson, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Williams, and Wilder—37.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Allison, Ames, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Bliss, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Cobb, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herriek, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kathleisch, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Law, Lazear, Loan, Long, Longyear, Mallory, McAllister, McClurg, McKinney, Samuel F. Miller, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Nelson, Noble, Orth, Perham, Pike, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, James S. Rollins, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, William G. Steele, Strouse, Sweat, Thayer, Tracy, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Windom, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—78.

So the amendment of the Senate was not concurred in.

Ninety-fifth amendment:

Add the following as an additional section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That twenty per cent. be added to the annual compensation of the messengers, watchmen, and laborers employed in the several Departments and under the Commissioner of Public Buildings, to commence on the passage of this act and to terminate at the close of the next fiscal year, but to be calculated only upon the amount of compensation accruing after the approval of this act: Provided, however, That no salary be increased hereby so as to exceed the sum of $300. And the sums necessary to pay the additional compensation herein specified for the present and the next fiscal years are hereby appropriated.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence in this amendment, with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out after the word "that" all of said Senate amendment, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

From the 1st day of January, 1864, until the 30th of June, 1865, inclusive, the pay of the employes hereinafter designated, whose annual pay is now less than $1,000, and who are employed at the date of the passage of this act or thereafter in the several Executive Departments and under the Commissioner of Public Buildings at Washington, shall be adjusted and allowed according to their respective term of service within that period, as follows: the pay of messengers at the rate of $1,000 per annum; the pay of assistant messengers at the rate of $350 per annum; the pay of watchmen and laborers at the rate of $800 per annum: Provided, That the pay of female employes in the several Executive Departments, and of laborers at the Capitol, including those in the Library of Congress, where such employes or laborers now receive less than $600 per annum, shall be at the rate of $600 per annum; and the sums necessary to pay the additional compensation for the period above prescribed are hereby appropriated.

The amendment reported by the Committee of Ways and Means was agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was then concurred in.

Ninety-sixth amendment:

Add the following as an additional section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow to the late reporter of the Supreme Court the amount of his annual salary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, on the production of satisfactory evidence that he has delivered to the Secretary of the Interior the number of copies of the decisions of said court prescribed by law, and that said books have been received and accepted by said Secretary.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence in this amendment with the following amendment as an addition thereto:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the clerical force now authorized by law, the following clerks are hereby authorized in the office of the Commissioner of Customs, to be employed and continue only during the rebellion and for one year after its close, viz: two clerks of class four, two of class three, and two of class two, and the sum of $11,200, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay their salaries from the date of their appointment to the 30th of June, 1865, is hereby appropriated therefor; and the classification of the clerks in the office of the Commissioner of Customs shall hereafter be as follows: six clerks of class four, eight of class three, eight of class two, and two of class one.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That in executing the act of the 3d of March, 1849, and the act amendatory thereof, providing for payment for steamboats and other vessels, and railroad engines or cars lost or destroyed while in the military service of the United States, the Third Auditor of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized in person, or in such manner as he may deem most compatible with the public interests, to take testimony and make such investigations as he may deem necessary in adjudicating claims filed under said act, and for such necessary expenses incurred therein payment may be made out of the appropriation contained in said act, upon proper vouchers certified and approved by the Third Auditor.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of July, 1864, in lieu of the clerks heretofore authorized and provided, the Assistant Treasurer at New Orleans be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, one chief clerk, at a salary of $2,500 per annum; one clerk, at a salary of $2,000 per annum; two clerks, at a salary of $1,500 per annum each; one porter, at a salary of $900 per annum; and two watchmen, at a salary of $600 per annum each; and the compensation for such clerks for the next fiscal year be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. And in case of the sickness or unavoidable absence of the Assistant Treasurer, he may, in his discretion, authorize the chief clerk to act in his place and to discharge all the duties required by law of the Assistant Treasurer.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That so many of the clerks in the office of the Paymaster General as have been or may be deemed unnecessary, not exceeding thirty-seven in number, who shall be found competent, to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, are hereby transferred to the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury, and shall be classified as follows: twelve clerks of class two, and twenty-five of class one; and the sum of $46,800, or so much thereof as may be found necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for said purpose.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, in addition to the present number, two appraisers for the port of New York, at an annual salary of $2,500 each, and the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated therefor.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the sum of $25,000 heretofore appropriated for salaries and expenses of nine supervising and fifty local inspectors of steam vessels, with traveling and other expenses, the sum of $55,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That there be, and hereby is, appointed, in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, five clerks of class three, in lieu of five clerks of class one, and the sum of $2,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment to the amendment, to come in after the last section but two of their amendment:

For twelve additional clerks in the office of the Assistant Treasurer at New York, at an annual salary of $1,400 each, authorized by act of 6th March, 1862, $16,800.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. I believe there can only be one amendment to the Senate amendment pending.

The SPEAKER. There can be an amendment to the Senate amendment and an amendment to that. It will be seen by the Digest that the Senate amendment is treated as the original text.

Mr. HOLMAN. But can any gentleman offer an independent section?

The SPEAKER. Yes, if it be germane.

Mr. HOLMAN. Can anything be offered that is germane to the original bill as it passed the House?

The SPEAKER. Anything germane to the ninety-sixth amendment of the Senate, or to the amendment to that reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, is in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is an independent proposition and is not an amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I make the point of order that there is no provision in this section of the bill having any relation to custom-house clerks in New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, inasmuch as all these sections are in the nature of one amendment, and inasmuch, also, as this is to carry out an existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand the Chair to decide that the amendment to the amendment is germane?

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that all these amendments from the Committee of Ways and Means are in the nature of one amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. But is it germane?

The SPEAKER. It is in relation to clerks, who are referred to several times in the amendment, and the Chair therefore thinks it germane. It is also in order on another ground, that it carries out an existing law.

The question was taken on Mr. PENDLETON's amendment to the amendment reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, and it was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I propose to send up to the Clerk's desk a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in explanation of the amendments reported from the Committee of Ways and Means.

The Clerk read the letter.

Mr. KERNAN. I move to amend the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means by striking out the following paragraph:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, in addition to the present number, two appraisers for the port of New York, at an annual salary of $2,500 each, and the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated therefor.

They have got along in New York when the imports have certainly been as large as they can be expected to be hereafter. It seems to me that the creation of these additional offices is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. PENDLETON. I send up to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

The letter was read by the Clerk.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the increase of imports spoken of in the Secretary's letter must be temporary. If the present force has been adequate to do the work during the last year of very heavy importations, I think that it ought to be quite adequate now that the importations will be considerably diminished.

The question being on Mr. KERNAN's amendment to the amendment,

Mr. HERRICK called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KERNAN and MARVIN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 25, noes 70.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee of Ways and Means to the amendment of the Senate, and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on the Senate amendment, as amended, and it was concurred in.

The last amendment of the Senate was to amend the title of the bill by adding the words "and for other purposes," and it was concurred in.

Mr. PENDLETON moved to reconsider the votes by which the several amendments of the Senate were disposed of; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 74) referring the claim of J. H. Clark & Co. to the Court of Claims; when the Speaker signed the same.

BUSINESS ON SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table for the purpose of disposing of the Senate amendments to the bank bill.

Mr. BROOKS. The only objection I have is this, that the bill, in the form in which it passed the House, was never discussed here at all. It was introduced and put through under the previous question. I shall therefore object to its coming up now, unless the amendments of the Senate can be considered separately.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that when these amendments shall be taken up they will of course be discussed seriatim.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not object to going to the business on the Speaker's table if the amendments are to be considered seriatim, but that is not the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts. His proposition is to put the bill right through without discussion or consideration.

Mr. HOOPER demanded tellers on the motion. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOOPER and BROOKS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 32.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the consideration of House bills with Senate amendments.

PAYMASTERS' CLERKS.

An act (H. R. No. 300) for the classification of the clerks to paymasters in the Navy and graduating their pay, reported from the Senate with an amendment.

The amendment of the Senate was read. It provides for changing the classification of clerks to paymasters in the Navy.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that it may be a long time before the committee will be permitted to report it back.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If I understand it, I should hope it would never be reported back.

Mr. COX. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I hope that the gentleman from Ohio will give way and have this matter disposed of. The amendment of the Senate provides simply for classifying the clerks of paymasters of the Navy.

The bill passed the House and has been returned from the Senate with this amendment, which the Committee on Naval Affairs have substantially agreed to. I hope the amendment will be concurred in before the House adjourns.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to the passage of that bill. I have examined it and think it is a good bill; what I object to is to having this bank bill come up to-night. I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does this amendment increase the salary of these clerks?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. It does not; it is a classification for the express object of not doing that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I have no objection to it, and withdraw my motion to refer.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

An act (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, reported from the Senate with amendments, was now taken up.

Mr. COX. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the House adjourns now will this bill come up in the morning?

The SPEAKER. It will come up in the morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope, then, by unanimous consent the yeas and nays will be dispensed with.

There being no objection, the order for the yeas and nays was rescinded.

And then (at fifteen minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 24, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of the board of control of the State Bank of Ohio, remonstrating against the levy of a tax on the issue of notes by State banks, with a view of expelling them from circulation; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, it was Ordered, That Mary B. Hook have leave to withdraw her petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

COUNTERFEITING OF COIN.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 455) to punish and prevent the counterfeiting of coin of the United States, to report it back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass; and as there is probably but one opinion about it I will ask that the bill be considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill to-day.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have on three or four occasions endeavored to finish a bill that was under consideration some days ago; but I find that as long as committees can come in with their reports and ask for their immediate consideration they can have consideration, and nothing else can be done in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is for the Senator to object to the consideration of the bill, and then it will go over as a matter of course.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports are still in order.

MAIL SERVICE TO BRAZIL.

Mr. COLLAMER. I move that all previous orders be postponed for the purpose of taking up House bill No. 407, authorizing the establishment of an ocean mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil. If gentlemen will allow me to take up my bill I shall have no objection to giving way to allow them to make reports.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have four or five bills reported from the Committee on Commerce that I should like to ask the indulgence of the Senate to pass this morning in the morning hour, and it will not take more than twenty or thirty minutes to pass them all.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to have this bill passed just as quick as gentlemen choose to vote upon it. It has been under consideration for three mornings.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the very reason why I object to its consideration now, because if it is taken up I know I shall not have an opportunity to pass my bills, which will lead to no debate.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will remark to the Senator in all courtesy that it is not three or four bills that I desire to take up, but only one, which has been under consideration now three mornings, and therefore I wish to have it finished.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall not certainly throw myself in the way of the Senator from Vermont; but the Senate will remember I gave notice last night that I should deem it my duty to press at the earliest possible moment the bill which is now on the table to establish a Bureau of Freedmen. Senators about me will bear witness that for the last three weeks I have tried every day to bring that bill forward, but I have failed. I had hoped to bring it into line, if I may so say, immediately after the passage of the Pacific railroad bill, and I still hope I may be able to do it.

Mr. DAVIS. This is the morning hour.

Mr. SUMNER. I know it is the morning hour; but I had hoped to take up my bill immediately after the Pacific railroad bill as the first business, and proceed with it until finished. But I shall not throw myself in the way of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will say in regard to the bill that the Senator from Vermont desires to call up that it was perhaps at my instance that it went over when it was up before, or rather I desired to make some remarks at that time in reply to the remarks of other gentlemen in reference to it; but I will—

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the call of the morning business, the regular order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will forego making those remarks, and content myself with asking for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. They have been ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But I will say to the Senator from Vermont, for the benefit of these other gentlemen who are pressing their bills, that, so far as I am concerned, I cannot be responsible for the rest of the Senate. The Senator from Vermont may get a vote on his bill without delay, unless others wish to debate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take this occasion to state, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky, that the Chair has called for the regular business, the reading of the Journal, petitions, and reports, and it is now under the control of the Senate to determine the order of business.

Mr. DAVIS. But, Mr. President, I understand that that is but a part of the morning business. I understand that there is other business that succeeds that. There is a call for bills and joint resolutions and for resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator in answer to that suggestion that the call for bills and joint resolutions and for resolutions is a mere practice of the Senate, not required by the rules.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, I hope the practice will be adhered to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Are reports now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall have a vote on that.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 407) authorizing the establishment of an ocean mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doxittle, Foot, Foster, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Wilkinson, and Willey—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Van Winkle—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Fessenden, Hale, Harding, Harris, Hicks, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Riddle, Wilson, and Wright—14.

So the bill was passed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a memorial of Joel Wayburn Van Orman, praying for the passage of an act authorizing the proper officers of the Government to issue a patent to him for certain lands in the State of Iowa, reported a bill (S. No. 288) to amend an act for the relief of Solomon Wadsworth; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. No. 42) to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint, and for the completion of said road, reported it with an amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 287) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget sound; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

FRENCH OCCUPATION OF MEXICO.

Mr. McDUGALL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution relative to the substitution of monarchical for republican government in Mexico, under European auspices, the same being House resolution No. 58.

Mr. SUMNER. Let that lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it must lie over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 192) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1865, and had agreed to other amendments of the Senate to the said bill, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 300) for the classification of the clerks to paymasters in the Navy, and graduating their pay.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 15) to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana; and

A bill (H. R. No. 300) for the classification of clerks to paymasters in the Navy, and graduating their pay.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed on the 20th instant the following act and joint resolutions:

An act (H. R. No. 251) to organize a regiment of veteran volunteer engineers;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 72) relative to pay of staff officers of the lieutenant general;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) relating to Green Clay Goodloe; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 78) providing for the election of a member of Congress for the State of Illinois by the State at large.

And on the 21st instant he approved and signed:

An act (H. R. No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865, and for other purposes.

VOTING IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. WADE. I desire to report a joint resolution from the Committee on the District of Columbia, for the passage of which there is an immediate necessity. That committee have directed me to report a joint resolution to amend the charter of the city of Washington. It relates to the registration of voters, and if it is to be passed at all it ought to be passed immediately. I believe there is no objection to it. It alters none of the present qualifications of voters, but improves the present law as to registration, which is very defective. I believe the people of the District all want it done, and I ask for the present consideration of the subject.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution (S. No. 57) to amend the charter of the city of Washington was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in case any person shall offer and claim the right to vote at any election held in the city of Washington, whose name is not registered, his name shall be registered by the commissioners of election upon his taking an oath or affirmation to answer truly the questions put to him, if he shall state in his answers positively that he has resided in the city one year next preceding the day of election, designating particularly the place of his residence, and that he possesses the other qualifications of an elector now required, and if some qualified elector of the city, not a candidate for any office at the election, shall swear that he has reason to believe and does believe that all the statements of the applicant are true. If the applicant be unable to understand the English language the oath may be interpreted to him by one of the commissioners or an interpreter sworn by a commissioner, which interpreter shall also interpret the applicant's answers. In lieu of presenting himself in this manner, the applicant may present the affidavit of himself and a qualified elector, duly certified before any justice of the peace for the county of Washington, satisfying the commissioners that he has been a resident of the city one year next preceding the day of election, and that he is otherwise a qualified elector, and thereupon the commissioners may cause his name to be registered and shall thus receive his vote. Any willful false statement is made perjury.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would ask the honorable member who reported this joint resolution how it changes the present law. I have not recently seen the law as it stands now, and I do not know what change this effects.

Mr. WADE. It points out a mode whereby many may be registered whom the old law does not provide for. For instance, where parties are foreigners their oath may be interpreted under this joint resolution. That is one change. Then, as the law now stands, persons cannot be registered after the 31st of December preceding an election; so that no one can vote at the coming election in June who was not registered at the end of last year. This enables them to be registered now. I do not know that I can point out all the variations between this and the old law, but it enables those who are qualified under the old law and who are not registered to be registered now. I think there is no objection to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know that there is. I only proposed to ask one or two questions of the committee by whom the resolution was reported. I am not sure that I heard distinctly its reading. Is there any limit of time?

Mr. GRIMES. One year.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know; but is there any limit of time at which a party, if this bill passes, may register himself? May he register himself on the day of the election?

Mr. WADE. On the day of election he may be registered, I believe.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, however I may be in favor of the joint resolution in other respects, I must vote against it. These registration laws have been tried in other places; and to leave them open on the day of election would create confusion, and would lead, as has been supposed, to very great fraud. If you limit some time before the election when the registration is to be made, provided the resolution only lets into the exercise of the franchise those who are really entitled to it, it would not be objectionable. It has been found practically that to permit men to be registered on the day of election opens the door to the perpetration successfully of fraud, and permits to vote a great many persons who in point of fact are not entitled to vote: they are brought in for the purpose. These oaths, although some security, are not the absolute security that they are generally supposed to be. I would suggest, therefore, to the member from Ohio if he had not better limit some time within which the registration may be made. To allow it to be done on the day of election would create great confusion at the polls, and the officers would not be able perhaps to take the votes.

Mr. WADE. I have no objection to a limitation of that kind, though it does not occur to me that it would lead to fraud to let the provision be as broad as it now is in the resolution.

Mr. HALE. I think it would be a good idea to require the gentlemen who register these names to be in session some three days prior to the election for the purpose of receiving applications. I believe that is the law in our own State, where we have a registration; the assessors are required to be in session three days before the election.

Mr. JOHNSON. Any time that will enable them to do it. If you permit it to be done on the day of election it leads to trouble.

Mr. WADE. I supposed this resolution would not lead to debate, and I promised the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] who desires to pass some bills, that if it did I would give way to him.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to propose an amendment to obviate the difficulty that is suggested.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that this joint resolution be postponed until to-morrow and be printed, and that we take up House bill No. 426. The motion was agreed to.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTORS.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the bill (H. R. No. 426) to create an additional supervising inspector of steamboats and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, and two local inspectors for the collection district of Oregon, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the appointment, in the mode prescribed by law, and who shall be paid the same annual compensation as is now paid, one additional supervising inspector of steamboats, and two local inspectors of steamboats, in Portland, in the collection district of Oregon, and two for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, at an annual compensation of $700, to be paid as provided by law, as in case of other like inspectors. They are to perform the duties and be subject to the provisions of the steamboat act of August 30, 1852.

It also proposes to repeal so much of that act as provides for the appointment of two local inspectors of steamboats in the district of Wheeling, on the Ohio river, and to provide that each engineer and pilot, licensed according to the provisions of that act, shall pay for every certificate granted by any inspector or inspectors the sum of ten dollars, to be accounted for in the mode provided by law.

The amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to insert the following new sections:

SEC. 4. And he it further enacted, That the forty-second section of the act of August 30, 1852, be so construed as to require the inspection of the hull and boiler, in the manner prescribed by that act, of every vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, and engaged as a ferry-boat, tug or towing-boat or canal-boat, in all cases where, under the laws of the United States, such vessels may be engaged in the commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States.

SEC. 5. And he it further enacted, That all engineers and pilots of ferry-boats, tug-boats, towing-boats, or canal-boats, subject to inspection by this act, shall be classified and licensed in the same manner as are pilots and engineers by said act of August 30, 1852.

SEC. 6. And he it further enacted, That, in lieu of the fees for inspection required by the thirty-first section of the act of August 30, 1852, the following shall be paid: for each vessel of one hundred tons or under, twenty-five dollars, and in addition thereto for each one hundred tons, over the first one hundred tons, five dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. I move to strike out the second section of the bill in the following words:

SEC. 2. And he it further enacted, That so much of said act as provides for the appointment of two local inspectors of steamboats in the district of Wheeling, on the Ohio river, and for their compensation, is hereby repealed.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is the opinion of the Treasury Department and likewise of the Committee on Commerce that inasmuch as there are two other inspection districts on the Ohio river, one at Pittsburg and one at Cincinnati, it is an unnecessary expense to continue the one at Wheeling. The Senate can decide. The effect of this amendment will be to retain the inspection district at Wheeling.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I did not hear the Senator from Michigan distinctly, but I know of no reason why this section should not be stricken out, and I have heard none.

Mr. CHANDLER. I said it was the opinion of the Treasury Department and likewise of the Committee on Commerce that inasmuch as there was an inspection district at Cincinnati and also one at Pittsburg, the one at Wheeling was a needless expense to the Government; but that is for the Senate to decide.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I desire to say, then, Mr. President, that Wheeling is a place where a great many steamboats are built. Steamboats are also built along the river between there and Parkersburg, and at Parkersburg in considerable numbers. The navigation above Wheeling particularly is for a great portion of the year interrupted for a boat of any size; and if the boats thus constructed are under the necessity of going to Pittsburg to be inspected, it is putting a heavier tax on the citizens than the expense of maintaining these inspectors can possibly be to the Government. The present system has been in operation for a number of years; Wheeling is the only city of great importance in the State of West Virginia, and this is a convenience that their interests demand. Wheeling is a manufacturing place where all these departments of business are carried on. Steamboats are there built from the keel up, furnished with their engines and everything else needed. On a mere representation that it may possibly be a little more economical to abolish the inspection district there, I do not think it ought to be done. The interests of these people are, if not as extensive as those of Pittsburg, certainly as near to them, and I am not sure that the number of steamboats built between Wheeling and Parkersburg and at Parkersburg is not equal to the number built at Pittsburg.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time; it was read the third time, and passed.

DUTIES ON FOREIGN SALT.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 356) requiring proof of payment of duties on foreign salt before payment of the allowances provided for by the act of July 29, 1813, and March 3, 1819. It provides that the allowance of bounty to certain vessels employed in the Bank and other cod fisheries, as provided for in the act of July 29, 1813, laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries, and the act of March 3, 1819, amendatory thereof, are not hereafter to be paid to any such vessel until satisfactory proof has been furnished to the collector of customs charged with the payment of such bounty that the import duty imposed by law on foreign salt imported into the United States has been duly paid on all foreign salt used in curing the fish on which the claim to the allowance of bounty is based.

Mr. POWELL. I should like that bill to lie over until to-morrow, and I make that motion.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope not. It simply compels proof that the duties have been paid before any drawback can be paid by the collector of the port.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill, but I want a little time to draw it up. I hope the Senate will indulge me for a few moments while I draw it up.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well. I move that this bill lie over informally with a view of taking up another bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER subsequently said: I am informed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. Fessenden] that the proposed amendment to House bill No. 356 will probably lead to debate, and if so, I will not insist on that bill to-day, but will let it lie over until to-morrow.

COLLECTION DISTRICTS IN OREGON.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the bill (S. No. 283) to abolish the collection districts of Port Orford and Cape Perpetua, in the State of Oregon, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to abolish the collection districts of Cape Perpetua and Port Orford, heretofore established by law, and to attach them to the collection district of Oregon.

Mr. NESMITH. That is a bill which interests my constituents somewhat, and as I am not familiar with the subject I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to state what the effect of the bill will be, and whether, under existing laws, the Secretary of the Treasury would be authorized to appoint deputy collectors for those districts.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir, he will; that will be the effect.

Mr. NESMITH. If that will be the effect I will not object to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

TRADE ON THE RED RIVER OF THE NORTH.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the bill (S. No. 272) to facilitate trade on the Red River of the North was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to designate and establish such points or places upon the Red River of the North as to him shall seem expedient for lading and unlading the cargoes of vessels navigating the river.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES KEENAN.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 63) to settle the account of James Keenan, late consul at Hong Kong, China. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the account of James Keenan, late consul at Hong Kong, China, by allowing him $2,801 84, the amount of judgment in certain cases obtained against him and paid by him; and also to pay him the amount incurred by him in the exchange between the countries, whatever it may be, and charge him with any balance on the books of the Treasury against him, and to pay him the balance, if any appears in his favor, out of any money not otherwise appropriated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is suggested to the Chair by the Secretary that the words "in the Treasury" ought to be inserted after the word "money" in the last clause of the bill, "out of any money not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to give notice of my intention to offer an amendment to the rules of the Senate. It is to add the following words to Senate Rule 24, to be a part thereof:

And when the call for the reports from standing and select committees are through, the President shall first call for joint resolutions of the two Houses, and then for resolutions proposed to be adopted by the Senate.

SIoux INDIAN DEPREDACTIONS.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move that the Senate take up House bill No. 377.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator that if that bill will be likely to occasion any debate it had better be deferred, because I gave notice on Friday that on Tuesday, that is to-day, at one o'clock I should move to proceed to the consideration of the tax bill. I deem it very important to take it up at that hour, and I shall make the motion when the hour arrives. I suggest to him, therefore, unless it is a matter that will not lead to debate, it is hardly worth while to take it up now.

Mr. WILKINSON. I presume this bill will lead to no debate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 377) making appropriations for the payment of the awards made by the commissioners appointed under and by virtue of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of persons for damages sustained by reason of the depredations and injuries by certain bands of Sioux Indians," approved February 16, 1863.

The bill proposes to appropriate the sum of $928,411, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of the several amounts awarded by the commission appointed under and by virtue of an act for the relief of persons for damages sustained by reason of the depredations and injuries by certain bands of Sioux Indians, approved February 16, 1863, to the several persons, firms, estates, and corporations, respectively, to whom such amounts were awarded by the commissioners, except the following persons, estates, and firms to whom awards were made, to wit: Antoine Roberts, J. C. Toberer, Gilbault & Co., W. L. Sumner, G. L. Mendelssohn, D. C. Marvin, Joseph Popp, B. Heinbeck, W. W. Pendergrast, Louis Thobald, J. and C. M. Dailey, B. H. Randall, Louis Robert, W. H. Forbes, estate of S. B. Garvie, deceased, A. Vajen and Brother, T. I. Pierce, estate of Francis Labathe, deceased, S. A. Hopper, estate of James C. Dickenson, deceased, Henry Apple, Theodore Crone, Charles Jacobs, F. Immel, H. C. Cooper, H. D. Cunningham, Joseph Descoleau, and Henry Behnke, which last claim is numbered three hundred and sixty-six on the books of said commissioners.

The second section provides that for the payment of so much of the awards made by the commissioners to the persons, firms, and estates specifically named in the first section of this act, as the Secretary of the Interior shall upon examination find to be due to them respectively, under the act approved February 16, 1863, there shall be appropriated the further sum of $241,963, or so much thereof as may be necessary. The Secretary of the Interior is directed to pay to the several claimants, or to their attorneys heretofore or hereafter duly authorized, other than those claimants specifically named in the first section, the several amounts as awarded by the commissioners, and also to pay the several sums he may find due, not exceeding the amounts respectively awarded by them to the persons, firms, and estates so specifically named.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I notice that the member of the Committee on Finance who reported this bill, the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Cowan,] is not now in his seat, and I hope it will not be acted upon until he comes in and makes an explanation of it. I suppose it may be taken up to-morrow morning in the morning hour.

Mr. WILKINSON. I am very anxious to have it disposed of; but if I thought there was or could be any objection to it now I would not urge it, and I would not urge it if I thought it would lead to any debate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is one o'clock now, and I would rather that it should go over until to-morrow, as the Senator from Pennsylvania is not in his seat.

Mr. WILKINSON. I will let it go over, with the understanding that I can have it taken up in the morning hour to-morrow.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to dispense with all prior orders with the view of taking up the tax bill.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course we are all in favor of the tax bill and I am in favor of proceeding with it, but I will make one remark simply to explain my own position with reference to other business. It is known, as I have already observed to-day, that I have been watching my opportunity to move the consideration of Senate bill No. 227, to establish a Bureau of Freedmen; that when my friend who had the Pacific railroad bill in charge rose to move his bill I rose at the same time, and that I united with him in fixing the order for the consideration of his bill with the understanding that mine should be proceeded with immediately after that. Of course it was not supposed then that the Pacific railroad bill would occupy so much time. Indeed, the Senator from Michigan assured me that it would be disposed of in one or two days, and I had supposed, therefore, that the Senate would be in a condition to proceed with the other bill some time last week. However, it has not been. The Pacific railroad bill has occupied all the time, as we know to our cost, until late last evening, and now we are to proceed with the consideration of the tax bill. As I have said, I am for the tax bill and I am for proceeding to it; but I cannot allow the bill to be taken up without this explanation with regard to the business which has been intrusted to me by the Senate, and which I may say I have much at heart myself.

The motion of Mr. FESSENDEN was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SUMNER. If I may make one further observation, I would say that I shall venture to throw myself on the indulgence of the Senate tomorrow in the morning hour, and ask them to proceed with the bill to which I have referred, hoping that in at least one or two days, perhaps in one day, we may get through with it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will simply remark to the Senate that I shall insist, if it is proper for me to use that expression, at any rate I shall persist in asking the Senate to proceed with the tax bill regularly at one o'clock every day until it is disposed of, to the exclusion of all other business. It is important that we should finish it and send it back to the other House, as very much remains to be done after we have concluded our labors upon it. With reference to the morning hour, I shall not of course attempt to interfere with that. I move to dispense with the reading of the bill through as is usual, in the first place, and to consider the amendments as they are reached in their order, section by section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken, unless there be objection.

Mr. HOWE. Is it the purpose of the chairman to act upon all amendments, or only upon those reported by the Committee on Finance, as the reading proceeds?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Upon those reported by the committee in the first place, and then it will be open to other amendments afterwards.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Maine to desire that the reading of the bill be continued until an amendment is reached, and then to have the amendment voted on, and so on.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued.

The Secretary proceeded to read the first section of the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was before the word "under," in line twelve of section one, to strike out the words "and hereby is charged;" so as to make the clause read:

A Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with an annual salary of $4,000, who shall be charged, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, with preparing, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out the words "as aforesaid" after the word "Commissioner," in the seventh and in the fifteen lines of the second section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the fourth section, after the word "revenue," in the fifth line, to insert, "and in the enforcement of the collection thereof;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury may appoint not exceeding five revenue agents, whose duties shall be, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to aid in the prevention, detection and punishment of frauds upon the internal revenue, and in the enforcement of the collection thereof, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section five, to insert after the word "inspectors," in line five, the words "and revenue agents aforesaid;" and before the word "Secretary," in line seven, to strike out the word "said;" and after "Secretary" to strike out the words "as aforesaid;" so as to make the clause read:

And such inspectors and revenue agents aforesaid shall be subject to the rules and regulations of the said Secretary, and have all the powers, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two of section six, to strike out the words "be and he" before "is," and the word "hereby" after "is;" so as to make the section read:

That the President of the United States is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a competent person who shall be called the Cashier of Internal Duties, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seven, line four, to strike out the words "be and he" before "is," and the word "hereby" after "is," and the word "respectively" after "divide," and to insert the word "respective" before "States" in line five; and after the word "alter" in line seven to strike out "lessen, enlarge, or merge in other districts;" so as to make the section read:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of assessing, levying, and collecting the duties or taxes hereinafter prescribed by this act, the President of the United States is authorized to divide the respective States and Territories of the United States and the District of Columbia into convenient collection districts, which he may alter as the public interests shall appear to him to require, and to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint, an assessor and a collector for each such district, who shall be residents within the same: Provided, That any of said States and Territories and the District of Columbia may, if the President shall deem proper, be erected into and included in one district: Provided further, That the number of districts in any State shall not exceed the number of Representatives to which such State shall be entitled in the present Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the words "Senators and" before "Representatives" in the sixteenth line of the seventh section; so as to make the proviso read:

Provided further, That the number of districts in any State shall not exceed the number of Senators and Representatives to which such State shall be entitled in the present Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to know the reason of that amendment. Is the existing system, by which our States are divided into districts according to the number of their Representatives, found not to work efficiently? Is it supposed that adding two more districts will increase the efficiency of the system? On that I have no evidence, and I merely ask for information.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is done on the recommendation of the Commissioner. He stated that in some States, owing to the very great territorial extent of the districts, it was impossible to have the work well done with only the number of districts allowed according to the number of Representatives; and particularly in the State of New York, where in some of the districts, not from their territorial extent but from the amount collected, it is necessary to have additional force. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] suggests that in the State of Iowa there is one district, and that has thirty counties. This provision is not imperative; it is only permissive. I presume no officers will be appointed who are unnecessary. It was thought best to allow an increase of the districts to some few States.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is a maximum only.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a maximum.

Mr. SUMNER. The only objection that occurred to me was what appeared on its face, that it was opening the door to two new offices in every State; that is all.

Mr. DAVIS. In the State of Kentucky one of the collection districts is composed of between two and three congressional districts. I received a communication from the collector which I laid before the chairman of the Committee on Finance, expressing his belief that it was not only inconvenient but impracticable to collect the revenue in so extensive a district as that, and he wanted it diminished at any rate to the size of a congressional district. I think the proposed reduction of districts in size and the increase of the whole number to the number of Representatives and Senators is not unreasonable.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eight, to strike out the words "of the" after "each" in line one; to strike out the letter "s" at the end of the word "assessors" in line two; to strike out "he" in line six and insert "the Secretary of the Treasury;" after the word "appoint," in line seven, to strike out "with the approval of the said Commissioner;" to strike out "who shall be resident therein" after "assistant assessor" in line eight; so as to make the section read:

That each assessor shall divide his district into a convenient number of assessment districts, which may be changed as often as may be deemed necessary, subject to such regulations and limitations as may be imposed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, within each of which the Secretary of the Treasury shall appoint one assistant assessor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifteen of section eight, after the word "appointed" to insert "and accepting the appointment;" and after the word "will," in line twenty-three, to strike out the words "to the best of my knowledge, skill, and judgment, diligently and faithfully execute the office and duties of assessor for (naming the assessment district,) without favor or partiality, and do equal right and justice in every case in which I shall act as assessor," and in lieu of them to insert "diligently and faithfully perform the duties of assessor (or assistant assessor) for (naming the assessment district) according to my best skill and judgment;" so as to make the clause read:

And each assessor and assistant assessor so appointed shall, before he enters on the duties of his office, take and subscribe, before some competent magistrate, or some collector, to be appointed by virtue of this act, (who is hereby empowered to administer the same,) the following oath or affirmation, to wit: I, A B, do swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America, and will support the Constitution thereof, and that I will diligently and faithfully perform the duties of assessor for (naming the assessment district) according to my best skill and judgment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask the reason of this change in the form of the oath. I confess I like the old one best, but I presume there is some good reason for it. I should like to hear what it is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a matter of taste. We thought it very much involved, and regarded it best to simplify it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I like the oath that he will administer his duties without favor or partiality, the same as judges declare that they will administer justice.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will he administer it faithfully if he does not administer without favor or partiality?

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We thought the words "diligently and faithfully" would cover every possible duty of his office.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think "without favor or partiality" is more particular. Still I shall not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section nine, line two, to strike out the word "such" before "collector;" in line six, after the word "approved" to strike out "as sufficient;" in line seven to strike out the words "containing the condition" and insert "conditioned;" in line fourteen to strike out the final "s" in "collectors;" in line fifteen, after the word "increase" to strike out "their" and insert "his;" and in line sixteen, after the word "direct" to insert "with such conditions as the said Commissioner shall prescribe;" so that the section as amended will read:

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That before any collector shall enter upon the duties of his office he shall execute a bond for such amount as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, with not less than five sureties to be approved by the Solicitor of the Treasury, conditioned that said collector shall faithfully perform the duties of his office according to law, and shall justly and faithfully account for and pay over to the United States, in compliance with the order or regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury, all public moneys which may come into his hands or possession; which bond shall be filed in the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury. And such collector shall, from time to time, renew, strengthen, and increase his official bond, as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct, with such conditions as the said commissioner shall prescribe.

Mr. HOWE. Was it the purpose of the committee to authorize the Commissioner to change the conditions of these bonds?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not to change the conditions, but to require such additional ones as might be necessary and desirable as the experience of the Department should suggest.

Mr. HOWE. The amendment, it seems to me, would authorize the Commissioner to require entirely different conditions from those which we have required. It seems to me that the section requires precisely the conditions that you want in such a bond. I cannot conceive that you would ever want any additional ones; I certainly think you would always want those named; but as often as the Secretary directs a new bond to be given this last amendment seems to authorize the Commissioner to change the conditions.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Say "with such additional conditions" or "such other conditions besides those herein specified." If the Senator will suggest an amendment I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. HOWE. I would suggest "additional conditions," if you want any change.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the amendment was suggested by the Commissioner, and we saw no objection to its being put in.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the word "further" before "conditions," in line sixteen.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I make no objection.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ten, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent any collector from collecting himself the whole or any part of the duties and taxes so assessed and payable in his district.

Mr. SUMNER. I suppose the reason for striking that out is that the proviso is unnecessary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section twelve, line four, after the word "deputies" to insert "and on all other persons."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section fourteen, line two, after the word "her" to insert "residence or;" in line three strike out "residence" and insert "business;" and in line six, after the word "residence" to insert "or business;" so that the clause will read:

That in case any person shall be absent from his or her residence or place of business at the time an assistant assessor shall call to receive the annual list or return, it shall be the duty of such assistant assessor to leave at such place of residence or business, with some one of suitable age and discretion, if such be present, otherwise to deposit in the nearest post office, a note or memorandum, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eleven of section fourteen, after the word "memorandum" to insert "which return shall be verified by oath."

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment I think should say "which return in all cases shall be verified by oath," so as to include the return provided for in the thirteenth section. I doubt whether the construction would not be that the words "which return shall be verified by oath" here would apply only to the return provided for in the fourteenth section, and would not extend back to the list or return provided for in the thirteenth section. To relieve all doubt about it, I move to amend the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator does not notice that the fourteenth section does not provide for the return, but for a notice to be served, and of course it refers to the previous return. "Shall call to receive the annual list or return" is the language, and you must refer back to the other section to find out what that return is. I do not know but that the language is rather defective. It is:

If such be present, otherwise to deposit in the nearest post office a note or memorandum, addressed to such person, requiring him or her to present to such assessor the list or return required by law within ten days from the date of such note or memorandum, which return shall be verified by oath.

I think the words "which return shall be" before "verified" are unnecessary.

Mr. HOWE. That evidently requires an oath only to the return obtained upon this notice.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What does the notice refer to?

Mr. HOWE. The notice refers only to those cases where the persons are absent at the time the assessor calls. The law first provides that it shall be the duty of anybody who has anything to list to list it. If he does not do it the assessor may call on him and obtain the list. If he lists it voluntarily, or lists it upon being called on by the assessor, he furnishes to the assessor the material out of which he can make a list, and in that case an oath is not required as the bill now stands. I think it ought to be required.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was the impression I had.

Mr. HOWE. If a man neglects to make his list voluntarily, or if he is not at home when the assessor calls on him, the assessor is to leave this notice, and in obedience to the notice he is to make out a return, and that return is to be upon oath, according to this amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. I should think that where the assessor was entirely satisfied of the correctness of the return we ought not to require an oath. It is a matter of some inconvenience as well as some expense to require an oath in every case. Where the assessor is not satisfied, of course I would require an oath; but to require every man all over the country, whether he have much or little, whether he be rich or poor, in all cases to swear to his return, I think is going too far. I think it is a hardship and expense.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a matter which was very much discussed in the committee, and the committee became so well convinced from the evidence before them that there were a large number of persons who would avoid making correct returns, and there would be sometimes great danger of collusion, or rather of a sort of easy disposition on the part of the officers appointed to allow people to get along pretty much in their own way and an unwillingness to interfere with them, that they thought the safest course was to provide that in all cases the return should be sworn to. I will not object of course to any words which are necessary in order to carry out the views of the committee in that particular.

Mr. POMEROY. Does the bill authorize the assessor to administer the oath?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly; or the parties may take the oath before anybody—they please who is authorized to administer it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit to the Senator from Maine whether in the preceding section, after the word "signed," in line twelve, the words "and verified by oath" had not better be inserted, so as to avoid all ambiguity. I think the literal construction would confine the oath to the return provided for by the fourteenth section; that is, to the return in case a notice is left in the absence of the person, while section thirteen provides for cases where the return is signed in the presence of the assessor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will notice that he will be obliged to go back to section eleven to make his amendment. Section eleven is the section that provides for the return. Section thirteen provides that if any person liable to pay any duty or tax, or owning, possessing, or having the care or management of property, goods, &c., liable to pay any duty, tax, or license, shall fail to exhibit the list or return required by law, but shall consent to disclose the particulars, the officer shall make the list or return for the person; but the eleventh section provides that it shall be the duty of any person, partnership, firm, association, or corporation made liable to any duty, license, stamp, or tax, to make a list or return to the assistant assessor. In that section the Senator might move to put in the words "which return shall be verified by oath," and strike out those words in the fourteenth section, because by inserting them in the eleventh section they would apply to all cases of returns, as was intended, and I think that would be a better place for the provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am inclined to think so myself.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will make that motion, I shall have no objection to the clause being inserted in the proper place in section eleven.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will therefore move to insert the words of the amendment under consideration in the sixth line of the eleventh section. After the word "return" in that line let the words "verified by oath" be inserted. Then I think there will be no harm in leaving this clause where it is in the fourteenth section.

Mr. HOWE. You ought to leave it there; and I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that in order to effect his object those words ought to be inserted both in section eleven and section thirteen, and left in section fourteen where they are.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. HOWE. They are three distinct cases, as I understand it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say "verified by oath or affirmation."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will first be on the amendment proposed by the committee to the fourteenth section, to insert after the word "memorandum," in line eleven, the words "which return shall be verified by oath."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to insert after the word "return," in the sixth line of the eleventh section, the words "verified by oath or affirmation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I propose also—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the Senator moves his amendment, I suggest to him whether it would be proper to make that provision in section thirteen. It will be noticed that that section provides that where a person shall fail to make this return verified by oath, the assessor in that case may himself make it, if the person shall consent to disclose the particulars of any and all property, goods, wares, and merchandise, articles and objects liable to duty or tax. In that case "it shall be the duty of the officer to make such list or return, which being distinctly read, consented to, and signed by the person so owning, possessing, or having the care and management as aforesaid, shall be received as the list of such person."

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment should be inserted in line seven of that section so as to read, "shall consent to disclose on oath or affirmation the particulars of any and all the property," &c. That would probably be a better place for the amendment, and it would make the section in accordance with the laws of Ohio.

Mr. HOWE. Under that section the assessor acts but as a mere clerk of the party. He gives the officer the items and the officer writes them down, takes them right from the mouth of the party.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I make no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. My amendment is in line seven of section thirteen, after the word "disclose" to insert "on oath or affirmation."

Mr. HOWE. I think the amendment had better be made at the close of the section, so as to have the written statement sworn to rather than have the disclosure made on oath.

Mr. SHERMAN. The case provided for in the thirteenth section is one which the law of Ohio provides for. Some conscientious men, especially Dunkers and a few other classes of religious people, do not swear or affirm; and yet they are very honest people and will always disclose the value and particulars of their property, and never seek to avoid taxes. In such cases by the laws of Ohio a kind of affirmation is administered to them which they do not subscribe to, but which is substantially certified to by the officer. I know it is rather an evasion of the law, and I move it in this place in order to relieve that class of conscientious people.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say to the Senator that the word "affirmation" in all the States with which I am acquainted means simply the affirmation that is taken by people of the Society of Friends, who are conscientiously scrupulous about taking an oath, and they affirm.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are branches of that society that will not even take an affirmation.

Mr. HOWE. Then I submit that if the Senator wishes to relieve that class of people, he should not require them to make this disclosure on oath. That will not relieve them; they will not take that oath.

Mr. SHERMAN. They affirm in a kind of way.

Mr. HOWE. But the amendment proposed is that this disclosure shall be made "on oath."

Mr. SHERMAN. "Or affirmation."

Mr. HOWE. Are they any more conscientiously opposed to swearing or affirming to a written statement than to a verbal one?

Mr. SHERMAN. They will not sign a written oath or affirmation; that is their dogma; although I have seen a kind of affirmation administered to them in courts. In a great many cases it creates embarrassment so that they can scarcely act as executors or administrators. In many cases they refuse to act as the law requires an oath or affirmation.

Mr. HOWE. I may be mistaken about this; but while the Senator from Ohio is endeavoring to furnish some relief to a peculiar class of people, of whom I never heard before, men so conscientious that they will neither take an oath nor make an affirmation, it seems to me he is exposing the framework of this bill to very serious peril. If you do not require this return to be sworn to, while all others are, any man who wishes to withhold a just return will say to the assessor, "I will not make any list; I will not make any return; I will give you the items out of which you can make one." The assessor administers an oath to him to give true returns. It is on parol; there is no record of it. He goes on then, having taken such an oath as the assessor sees fit to administer, to make true statements, to give his list, to give the particulars. What he actually swears to does not appear in writing. There is no return of that oath made. The assessor writes down the items he gets from him. If in law he is supposed to have sworn to that return which the assessor makes, then you substitute a legal inference for a certificate appended; and it seems to me you make that uncertain which ought to be certain.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will suggest to Senators whether the difficulty would not be avoided by striking out the word "shall" in the fourteenth line and inserting "may," so that it will read, "may be received as the list of such person," leaving the discretion to the assessor on the subject if he is satisfied that the list is a correct one. I have no objection to putting in the words "on oath or affirmation," if Senators desire it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think they had better be put in there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. After the word "disclose?"

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care where they are inserted. They could just as well be inserted after the word "disclose," but if the Senator prefers to insert them in the twelfth line I have no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then let them be inserted in that line.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the better place would be to insert them after the word "signed," in the twelfth line. The clause now reads:

Then, and in that case, it shall be the duty of the officer to make such list or return, which being distinctly read, consented to, and signed by the person so owning, possessing, or having the care and management as aforesaid, shall be received as the list of such person.

I will move after the word "signed" to insert the words "and verified by oath or affirmation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest whether it would not be well to change the word "shall" in the fourteenth line to "may," so as not to make it imperative to receive it, but leave it to the discretion of the assessor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that ought to be so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is provided for in the subsequent section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the subsequent section, section fourteen, line eleven, I move to strike out the words "which return shall be" before the word "verified," so that it will read:

It shall be the duty of such assistant assessor to leave at such place of residence, with some one of suitable age and discretion, if such be present, otherwise to deposit in the nearest post office, a note or memorandum, addressed to such person, requiring him or her to present to such assessor the list or return required by law within ten days from the date of such note or memorandum, verified by oath.

It is a mere notice to him. I think it will read better in that way.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I propose further to amend that clause by inserting after the word "oath," in the twelfth line of the section, the words "or affirmation."

Mr. JOHNSON. I think those words are always understood.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section fourteen, line eighteen, to strike out the words "false or fraudulent" before the word "list," and after the word "return" to insert "which in the opinion of the assessor is false or

And if any person, on being notified or required as aforesaid, shall refuse or neglect to give such list or return within the time required as aforesaid, or if any person shall not deliver a monthly or other list or return without notice at the time required by law, or if any person shall deliver or disclose to any assessor or assistant assessor any list, statement, or return which, in the opinion of the assessor, is false or fraudulent, or contains any under-statement or under-valuation, it shall be lawful for the assessor to summon by subpoena, to be served by any assistant assessor, such person, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section fourteen, line thirty-two, after the word "contempt," to insert "and for the purpose of enforcing such attachment said assessor shall be vested with all the powers exercised by judges of the district courts of the United States in like cases."

Mr. JOHNSON. What is to be the operation of that amendment? Is it to give authority to the assessor to commit persons to prison?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. That seems to me going rather further, I think, than at present advised I should be willing to go.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know of any other way to reach it. At any rate, as the section reads without amendment, it cannot have much effect: "And to enforce such writ by attachment for contempt." He may attach a person for contempt; but what will he do with him afterwards if he refuse to do anything after he is attached? There must be some power of commitment.

Mr. JOHNSON. He can hand him over, I suppose, to the courts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is nobody to hand him over to, and there is no other course to be taken. You must either strike out the whole clause, which would deprive the assessors of all power with reference to the matter, or else you must give them sufficient authority to enforce the writ. I do not think there is any danger that can arise from it. It is merely for the purpose of obtaining testimony. If persons refuse to testify, they ought to be compelled to do so, and punished if they do not.

Mr. DAVIS. I am opposed to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, and will move to amend the amendment by striking out of the text of the bill the words "and to enforce such writ of attachment for contempt," and in connection with those words to strike out the whole amendment as reported by the committee. The amendment is somewhat obscure and ambiguous in its language, I think; but to give it the construction to which it would be entitled, it clothes the assessor with enormous powers by which he will be enabled to harass and oppress men very greatly. It would be entirely too much power to place in the hands of men of the legal intelligence of those who generally fill the office of assessor. I do not object to his examining a party upon oath, and I do not object to declaring a false oath before him to be perjury or false swearing, and that a person guilty of that perjury or false swearing shall be subject to the pains and penalties generally attached to those crimes; but I do utterly object to the proposition to invest in these assessors a power parallel with that of the district courts in case of contempt. The committee propose to insert these words:

And for the purpose of enforcing such attachment said assessor shall be vested with all the powers exercised by judges of the district courts of the United States in like cases.

What like cases?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Cases of contempt.

Mr. DAVIS. So I supposed. Now, what are the powers vested in district courts in cases of contempt? They issue an attachment; they summon the party before them for contempt; they fine and imprison him. Do the committee propose to invest all this power in an assessor? It is a power that would be very greatly abused. I know some of the men who are assessors in Kentucky, and I know it is a power which many of them are utterly incompetent to exercise for the want of intelligence, and many for the want of high moral principle. Under that amendment, an assessor having a spite against a particular individual or who might be inimical to him, would have the power to summon him before him, to examine him upon oath; and if the examination was not satisfactory to him, he would have the still further power to confine and imprison him, just as a judge of the district court of the United States may imprison a person for contempt. Why, sir, it is clothing a pigmy with the power to wield a thunderbolt. It is a power altogether disproportionate to the office of assessor, and disproportionate to the intellect and intelligence and legal capacity of the men who fill it. It is one of the highest powers with which a civil officer can be clothed, to call up a man before him summarily to answer to him for contempt, and if the answers do not suit the august judge, that he shall have the power forthwith to fine him at the discretion to which a judge may fine for contempt, or order him to be imprisoned in jail. I am opposed to clothing these assessors with any such extensive and grave powers as those.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that the amendment he proposes will hardly be an amendment to the amendment, but is an amendment of the original text of the bill which may be moved after the amendment of the committee shall have been disposed of.

Mr. DAVIS. If that amendment should be adopted, can I then move to strike out the original text including the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator can do so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me suggest, by way of obviating what seems to be a difficulty—and the clause is really obnoxious to some objection, I think, by allowing these inferior officers to exercise this high power—that it be amended so as to allow the assessors to enforce such writ of attachment for contempt, returnable before the judge of the district court of the United States of the district where the defaulting witness resides, and let him proceed as in other cases.

Mr. DAVIS and Mr. JOHNSON. That will do.

Mr. GRIMES. Why not say "judge of the district or commissioner of the United States?"

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; I do not wish to give to a commissioner of the United States authority to imprison a man for contempt. Let the party pay the expenses, and let the writ be returnable before the judge of the district court.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator can make the proposition in writing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I merely suggest it to obviate this difficulty, but it can be reduced to writing in a minute.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know but that would be better than the amendment as it stands. We are not at all anxious to retain anything obnoxious, and if the Senator will be kind enough to put it in shape I will not object to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will prepare an amendment to carry out that idea. The Senate can in the mean time pass to the next amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we had better fix this first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The Senator will put in writing his proposed modification of the committee's amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to strike out all of the amendment reported by the committee and to insert:

And returnable before the judge of the district court of the United States, having jurisdiction over said assessor's district, and who, for the purpose of enforcing such attachment, is vested with all the powers exercised by judges of the district courts of the United States in like cases.

Mr. DAVIS. Why not say "cases of contempt?"

Mr. TRUMBULL. "Like cases" would mean "cases of contempt."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator to insert these words:

Returnable before the judge of the district court in the district in which such person resides, who shall forthwith proceed to hear and determine the same, and make such order and decree thereon as he may judge necessary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desired to preserve the language of the bill. That is the same thing, and I have no objection to that, though I think the language of the bill is just as good. I will withdraw my amendment, and allow that to be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the Committee on Finance, to strike out all of the committee's amendment in the following words:

And for the purpose of enforcing such attachment said assessor shall be vested with all the powers exercised by judges of the district courts of the United States in like cases.

And to insert in lieu thereof the words that have been read by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will change the phraseology so as to read, "forthwith proceed to hear and determine thereon, and to make such order and decree as he may judge necessary for the purpose of enforcing such attachment."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so modified, and as it now stands will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Returnable before the judge of the district court for the district in which such person resides, who shall forthwith proceed to hear and determine thereon, and to make such order and decree as he may judge necessary for the purpose of enforcing such an attachment.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am not satisfied with this proposition, even as it now stands. I think it is very objectionable. It proposes to confer upon this excise officer judicial power so far as it relates to the issuing of process. It authorizes an assessor to issue process to punish for contempt. That would be very extraordinary, very objectionable, very obnoxious, I think. What kind of process would this be? An attachment for contempt is issued by a judicial tribunal; it is issued under the seal of the court; and it is served by an officer of the court. Who is to serve this attachment? Who is to arrest this person and execute this process, this subpoena? Has the marshal power? Has the assessor power? Has the deputy assessor power? Has any individual power? Who is to execute this attachment and to arrest this person?

Again, sir, the judge in the district in which I reside sometimes resides four hundred miles from the assessor; and is this person that is to be deputized by him, this imaginary person that is to serve this extraordinary process, issued without the seal of a court, issued by an assessor, a process to punish for contempt—is he to take this individual four or five hundred miles to the district judge for the purpose of having the matter inquired into? Sir, this is very extraordinary. It will never do. Some other mode must be devised. It will never do to confer upon an assessor, an excise officer, this extraordinary power.

Mr. FESSENDEN. One suggestion that the Senator has made is valuable. I see by a previous provision in this bill that the assessor is to summon by subpoena to be served by any assistant assessor. I move to insert after the word "contempt" in the thirty-second line the words "to be served by any assistant assessor;" so that it will read:

And to enforce such writ by attachment for contempt to be served by any assistant assessor, returnable before the judge of the district, &c.

I suppose that modification can be made without taking a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be so modified, if there be no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I really see no objection to this clause. The Senate will observe that it operates only upon persons in specific cases; that is, where they refuse to answer interrogatories, where they refuse to produce their books. A great difficulty arises in the collection of taxes, because the assessor cannot get at the information necessary to assess them. Suppose that after notice is given to a person to render an account he refuses to do it, or, when it comes in, the account is in such a condition that on the face of it it cannot be relied upon in any way. Then we propose, if it cannot be relied upon, or he refuses to render an account, to give power to the assessor to interrogate him on them, to make him come and answer questions. If he refuses to do that, if he has refused to render an account in the first place, and then refuses to answer any questions about it, so that the assessor is left entirely in the dark, then, in such a case, with reference to such an individual, thus contumacious, this power is given to the assessor, and is to be given to nobody else. If you are to have legal process issued against him and carry the matter through the courts there will be no end to it and no end to the expense; but we provide here that the assessor may arrest that person and take him, for his contumacy, his entire neglect and refusal to answer, before a court and compel him to answer questions which the assessor may put.

Suppose that it does excite feeling: It excites feeling only in the breast of a man who utterly refuses to do his duty. I hardly think that we should pay attention to the feeling that may be excited among such people who will not do what the law requires of them under such circumstances. We simply propose to take him before a person entirely unprejudiced, a judge of a court, to make him do that or to take the consequence. I do not see any ground for the objection, as the amendment now stands, made by the Senator from New York. I trust that the amendment may be adopted. I see no other way to accomplish the purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment in the first instance.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to. The amendment of the committee as amended was adopted.

The next amendment was in section fourteen, line fifty, after the word "refusal" to insert "or neglect, except in cases of sickness or absence from the State;" in line fifty-two, after the word "return" to insert "or to verify the same as aforesaid;" in line fifty-three to strike out "twenty" and insert "fifty;" and in the same line after the word "duty" to strike out the words "and in case of neglect (except in case of sickness) he shall add ten per cent. to such duty," and to insert "and in case of neglect occasioned by sickness or absence as aforesaid, the assessor may allow such further time for making and delivering such list or return as he may judge necessary, not exceeding thirty days;" so that the clause will read:

And in case of the return of a false or fraudulent list or valuation, he shall add one hundred per cent. to such duty; and in case of a refusal or neglect, except in cases of sickness or absence from the State, to make a list or return, or to verify the same as aforesaid, he shall add fifty per cent. to such duty; and in case of neglect occasioned by sickness or absence as aforesaid, the assessor may allow such further time for making and delivering such list or return as he may judge necessary, not exceeding thirty days; and the amount so added to the duty shall in all cases be collected by the collector at the same time and in the same manner with the duties; and the lists or returns so made and subscribed by such assessors or assistant assessors shall be taken and reputed as good and sufficient lists or returns for all legal purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of the fifteenth section the words "with costs of prosecution;" so that it will read:

That if any person shall deliver or disclose to any assessor or assistant assessor appointed in pursuance of law, any false or fraudulent list, return, account, or statement, with intent to defeat or evade the valuation, enumeration, or assessment intended to be made, or if any person who being duly summoned to appear to testify, or to appear and produce such books as aforesaid, shall neglect to appear or to produce said books, he shall, upon conviction thereof before any circuit or district court of the United States, be fined in any sum not exceeding $300, or be imprisoned for six months, or both, at the discretion of the court, with costs of prosecution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seventeen, line twelve, to strike out the word "at" and insert "as."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seventeen, lines eight and nine, to strike out the final "s" in the words "assistants" and "persons."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the eighteenth section of the bill.

Mr. HOWE. There are several verbal corrections which it seems to me ought to be made in that section, and I will suggest them now to the chairman. It occurs to me that the words "firms or corporations" ought to be inserted after the word "persons," in the eleventh line. They are used in the sixteenth line of the section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does the Senator move that amendment?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Are those words used in the other clauses of the bill? Is there in any other clause a distinction between "persons" and "corporations?" If not, "persons" would include "corporations," as here used.

Mr. HOWE. By an express statutory interpretation they do, and I do not know but at the common law they do; but the Senator will observe that these words are used in the sixteenth line of this section and repeatedly throughout the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is another matter. I asked if they were used as contradistinguished from each other.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir. I move in the eleventh line, after the word "persons" to insert "firms or corporations."

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the sixteenth line it reads, "firm, company, or corporation."

Mr. HOWE. Then I will say, "firms, companies, or corporations."

Mr. JOHNSON. It cannot be necessary to say "firms or companies."

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is so used in the sixteenth line of the same section:

Or for which any firm, company, or corporation is liable, with the amount of duty or tax payable thereon.

Mr. JOHNSON. I meant to say that the word "persons" would certainly include "firms."

Mr. FESSENDEN. This will make it consistent with the language used in other parts of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as modified, in line eleven, after the word "persons" to insert "firms, companies, or corporations."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. In the twenty-third line of the same section I think the word "list" should be "lists," and I make that motion. There are two general lists.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. In lines twenty-three and twenty-four I propose to strike out the words—and this, perhaps, is a little more than a verbal amendment—"the assessor under the direction of," so as to let these forms be devised directly by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The clause now reads:

The forms of the said general lists shall be devised and prescribed by the assessor, under the direction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think you had better let that stand as it is.

Mr. HOWE. Very well; I will withdraw that amendment. The clause continues:

And lists taken according to such forms shall be made out by the assistant assessors.

I suppose it means "and lists according to such prescribed forms shall be made out." These lists are taken by the assistant assessors and these general lists of the form prescribed are made out by the assistant assessors to be delivered to the assessors.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do you propose to strike out the word "taken?"

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that may as well be allowed to stand.

Mr. HOWE. Very well.

The next amendment of the committee was in section nineteen, line six, after the word "advertise" to insert "by not less than ten days' notice," and in line seven, after the word "time" to strike out the following words, "of which not less than ten days' notice shall be given," so that it will read:

That the assessors for each collection district shall, by advertisement in some public newspaper published in each county within said district, if any such there be, and by notifications to be posted up in at least four public places within each assessment district, advertise, by not less than ten days' notice, all persons concerned of the time and place within said county when and where appeals will be received and determined relative to any erroneous or excessive valuations, assessments, or enumerations by the assessor or assistant assessor returned in the annual list.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the nineteenth section the following:

The bills for the attendance and mileage of said witnesses shall be taxed by the assessor and paid by the delinquent parties, or otherwise by the collector of the district, on certificate of the assessor, at the rates usually allowed in said district for witnesses in courts of justice.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary proceeded to read the twentieth section of the bill.

Mr. HOWE. There is evidently a mistake in the nineteenth and twenty-first lines of that section. "Assistant assessor" should be "assessor" in both those places. It refers to the lists made out by the assessor of the district and handed over to the collector.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator move to amend by striking out the word "assistant?"

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to look at that a little. I am not satisfied about it.

Mr. HOWE. You will find it so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that the reading continue until we reach an amendment by the committee, and then the whole section will be open for consideration.

The Secretary continued the reading.

The next amendment was in section twenty, line forty-eight, after the word "monthly" to strike out the words "or special."

Mr. HOWE. The object of that portion of the section is to enable assessors to correct these lists by adding to them other names that they may find liable to a duty or a license:

And the same proceedings shall obtain and be had with respect to such objects of duty or tax as are by this act required in respect to objects of duty or taxes, and persons liable to tax regularly entered and returned on any monthly or special list.

That is the way it reads in the bill. This amendment proposes to strike out the words "or special." There are three of these lists; one is an annual, one is a monthly, and one is a special list, in which these different duties and licenses are enumerated. Some of these corrections will be of duties or licenses found only on the annual, some on the special, and some on the monthly list. I think all three of those terms ought to be employed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the Senator is right about it. That amendment should not be agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I will move to insert the word "annual" before "monthly."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question will be on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee to strike out the words "or special."

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin now moves to amend by inserting the word "annual" before the word "monthly."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am inclined to think that the Senator from Wisconsin was right in the amendment that he suggested to the first part of this section. I observe that the clause preceding the one to which he referred reads thus:

And where there is any property within any collection district liable to the payment of the said duty or tax, not owned or occupied by or under the superintendence of any person resident therein, there shall be a separate list of such property, specifying the sum payable, and the names of the respective proprietors, where known.

Then follows the clause to which the Senator referred:

And the assistant assessor making out any such separate list shall transmit to the assistant assessor where the persons liable to pay such tax reside.

That presupposes that they do not reside in the district. It should read, therefore, "to the assessor of the district where the persons liable," &c., inserting "of the district" after "assessor," should it not?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That I understand to be the proposition of the Senator. I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposition, if the Chair understands it, is to strike out the word "assistant" in the nineteenth line, and also in the twenty-first line.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; not to strike out the word "assistant" in the nineteenth line.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; it is the assessor who is to make out these lists.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I beg the Senator's pardon. These lists are made out by the assistant assessors, I believe.

Mr. HOWE. The section reads thus:

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That the said assessors of each collection district, respectively, shall, immediately after the expiration of the time for hearing appeals concerning taxes returned in the annual list, and from time to time as duties, taxes, or licenses become liable to be as-essed, make out lists containing the sums payable according to law upon every object of duty or taxation for each collection district; which lists shall contain the name of each person residing within the said district, or owning or having the care or superintendence of property lying within the said district which is liable to any tax or duty, or engaged in any business or pursuit requiring a license, or when such person or persons are known, together with the sums payable by each; and where there is any property within any collection district liable to the payment of the said duty or tax, not owned or occupied by or under the superintendence of any person resident therein, there shall be a separate list of such property, specifying the sum payable, and the names of the respective proprietors, where known.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin to be to strike out the word "assistant" where it first occurs in line nineteen, and also where it occurs in line twenty-one.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; and also to insert the words "of the district" in the twenty-first line.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question will be on striking out the word "assistant," in the places named.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I now move, after the word "assessor," in the twenty-first line, to insert the words "of the district."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin whether he wishes to have the same words inserted after the word "assessor" in the twentieth line.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are not necessary there.

The next amendment was to strike out the following proviso at the end of the twentieth section:

Provided further, That it shall be in the power of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to exonerate any assessor, as aforesaid, from forfeitures, in whole or in part, as to him shall appear just and equitable.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out, after the word "court," in line twenty-two of section twenty-one, the words "and the said court shall also render judgment against the said assessor or assistant assessor for double the amount of damages sustained in favor of the party injured, to be collected by execution."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the words "and shall not exceed the sum of $400,000," after the word "dollars," in line six of section twenty-two; so as to make the clause read:

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed and paid to the several assessors, from the date of their appointment, a salary of $1,500 per annum, payable quarterly, and in addition thereto, where the receipts of the collection district shall exceed the sum of $100,000 annually, one half of one per cent. upon the excess of receipts over $100,000, &c.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to have that amendment passed over for the present. I was very much opposed in committee to striking out those words, and I am still.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am averse to passing over an amendment, because it makes confusion. I should like to have the Senator state his objections now.

Mr. HOWE. Perhaps it may be just as well to act upon it now. I think the effect of this amendment, and the one which follows it in the tenth line of this section, is to raise these salaries above what we ought to pay. The proposition of the bill as it came to us was to pay this percentage in all the districts where the collections were over $100,000 and did not exceed $400,000, and to fix $3,000 as the maximum of the salary in any case. The effect of these two amendments together is to make the limitation $4,000 instead of $3,000. I think there are in these few lines two pieces of injustice perpetrated. I think we provide a higher salary in some districts than should be paid anywhere; and I think that in other districts we make the salary lower than it should be. My idea is that there is not so much difference in the amount of labor performed in the poor districts, so to speak, and that performed in the wealthy districts as this amendment contemplates. Each of these districts has about the same number of people who will be assessed, or who are to be canvassed with a view to assessment, and there is no more labor in putting down a heavy sum against an individual than a light sum. You have to go over about the same number of names. But ordinarily in those districts where you get the least money you have to travel over the largest extent of country in order to find the people. The travel in some of your frontier districts is very considerable. It is not all performed by the assessor, nor any considerable part of it by the assessor, to be sure; but he has to correspond with a great many assistants living at a great distance from him. He has an extensive correspondence to carry on, and more extensive than would be required if his district was more compact. I think, therefore, if you pay a percentage at all, you ought to commence at the first dollar, and you ought to stop paying it when you get the pay up to $3,000.

My idea is that the offices of assessor and collector in the district in which Peoria, in the State of Illinois, is situated, would be the two best places probably in that State, and I do not suppose it costs any more to live in that district than it does in any other district of the country. I do not suppose the amount of labor is very much more than it will be in any other district. There will be a little more vigilance required, perhaps, to oversee that business.

My view is, as I said before, that we ought to commence paying this percentage on the first dollar if it is to be paid at all, and I am not very urgent that it shall be paid. I am not sure that you cannot get just as efficient service for $1,500 a year and these expenses, postage, stationery, clerk hire, and office rent fairly adjusted and fairly liquidated, as you can by these higher salaries; but I think it very unjust that the assessor in the district adjoining the Peoria district, in Illinois, or in the district adjoining the first district of my State, should be limited to $1,500 and no percentage, while the assessor in the first district, in which Milwaukee is, should have $4,000. It does not follow that he will live in Milwaukee, nor does it follow that his living in Milwaukee is any more expensive. There is an inequality about it and an injustice which I should be glad to get rid of if possible.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The difficulty is inherent in the business. It is impossible to make these things equal. We all know that a large business is done in some districts and comparatively small business in others; and any attempt to equalize the compensation, unless you fix a mere salary and make it square throughout, will be entirely futile. Now, then, the question arises whether there should be a percentage, and upon that I believe the committees of both Houses have been entirely agreed, for the simple reason that if you allow a percentage the result is an effort or an inducement to an effort on the part of the assessors to pick up all the assessable property that there is. Suppose you fix a salary, the assessor receives that salary whether he assesses more or less, or whether he assesses anything. It therefore has been believed to be a sound principle that, while we provide for paying a respectable salary to some extent, in part at least the compensation shall be made up of a percentage on the collections to induce him strenuously, carefully to discover what property there is in his district that is assessable. I think it would be entirely unsafe to proceed on any other principle.

Again, take the salary we fix of $1,500. No one supposes that in the city of New York or the city of Boston, for instance, any man who is fit for the office could be found who would perform its duties for that amount of salary. It is a salary that is paid to the inspectors of revenue, to the weighers and gaugers; and here is a man who has control of the assessment which leads to the collection of millions of dollars, performing most important duties, and requiring responsible persons of character and of ability. It is vain to expect that you can find such a man in many places in this country, and in those places especially where the largest amount of revenue is collected, for any such sum as is fixed as a salary. You must therefore make up a proper compensation to him in some other way, and the only way in which you can make it up is by giving him a percentage on the collections up to a given point. You must fix your point somewhere and stop, because in the districts to which I have alluded, in the city of New York, or a great manufacturing district, if you give him a percentage on the whole amount collected his pay might be very much more than he ought to receive, and therefore you must fix a maximum, which we have done in this case, and we have increased the present maximum somewhat. That principle is found to be necessary, also, in order to prevent too great an inequality and the receipt of more money than a man is entitled to for the labor he performs.

But with regard to this particular case I think my friend cannot have scanned the section carefully, because, as it read originally, an assessor in a district where the collections were over four hundred thousand dollars would not be entitled to anything but his salary. Mark the peculiar phraseology:

And in addition thereto, where the receipts of the collection district shall exceed the sum of $100,000, and shall not exceed the sum of $400,000 annually, one half of one per cent. upon the excess of receipts over $100,000.

Suppose they went up to $500,000, he would get nothing but his $1,500. Therefore you must strike that out of course. That was an error unquestionably in the drafting of the bill. And then comes up the other principle, shall you stop when you get up to a given amount, and say he shall receive no more? Will you hold out to him an inducement to go on carefully, keenly, stringently, to find out what there is to be assessed in the district? We believed, and it was much discussed, that it was best, while you gave on the first $100,000, and necessarily gave on the first $100,000, a somewhat higher rate of percentage in order to bring up the salary to a proper sum, you should then give a small percentage on everything above that until he got up to the maximum fixed. I believe that is the best system that can be devised.

Mr. GRIMES. Why raise the maximum from $3,000 to $4,000?

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are very few districts in which the assessor will get over $3,000, and in some of the districts, in large cities, he ought to have more than $3,000. In some places where the assessments are largest and much revenue is collected you cannot get such a man as you ought to get for $3,000, as the rate of living is now in view of the depreciation of the currency. That was the belief of the committee; but Senators of course will judge for themselves about it. The committee considered the question carefully, and examined a great deal of testimony that was before them. They considered the increased rates of living, they considered the responsibilities that were imposed upon these men in places where a very large amount of revenue was collected, and they believed that comparatively a very small number of them would get a pay exceeding $3,000 under this provision; and they believed that the object which we seek to accomplish, that is, the collection of revenue, the putting of money into the Treasury, would be advanced very much by giving a more liberal salary in certain cases, and making it the interest of the men charged with this important duty to discharge it carefully and vigorously.

Such was the conclusion to which the committee came. If the Senate choose to cut down the amount, so be it. Senators know that I am as anxious as anybody to keep the expenditures within as narrow limits as possible, and to pay as small salaries as we can possibly get along with and as is consistent with the public service. If Senators think we have made a mistake in changing this maximum they will so vote. We have changed it also in the case of the collectors, raising it there to $5,000. At first we placed them on exactly the same footing; but we afterwards concluded to raise the maximum of a collector to $5,000, for the simple reason that in many cases where it would reach that sum the collectors must necessarily pay out a good deal. They employ their own assistants and pay them, and they are not allowed the same privileges that assessors are in other particulars; and while we limit the whole amount that they are entitled to appropriate for the pay of their assistants, we limit also the amount that they are allowed to retain for their own compensation. I believe there are few cases where it will come up to the maximum which we have fixed. Besides, they are obliged to give very heavy bonds, and their responsibilities are very great. The money responsibilities of assessors are nothing; they receive no money, they are responsible for none; they do nothing but make the assessments; and their allowances are larger in proportion than those of collectors. On very careful consideration, and with a view to have the matter discussed in the committee of conference which will undoubtedly be raised between the two Houses if the amendments which the Finance Committee have proposed be adopted, and to have the matter thoroughly reexamined there upon the evidence, we thought it best to fix the compensation at these sums. If the Senate disagree with us, very well; it is a matter which, of course, is of no more interest to me than to anybody else.

Mr. HOWE. Of course I have no especial interest in this matter; but the Senator from Maine has discussed this rate of compensation from two points of view. He defends this percentage, first, upon the assumption that it is necessary to secure honest service on the part of the assessor, and secondly, on the ground that it is necessary to secure efficient service. Now, if the payment of a percentage is supposed to be necessary in order to secure honest service, it is certainly as necessary after you get up to $4,000 as before you get there. If you want to secure and think to secure an honest administration of the office by holding out to the assessor the payment of this commission, tell him to be diligent, because in proportion to his diligence will be the amount of his compensation, then you should continue that inducement to him until he has exhausted his efforts, and you should pay him the same compensation on every dollar that he raises. If that be the purpose for which this commission is given, there should be no limitation upon it; you should begin it when he begins to assess, and you should only stop it when he stops assessing; pay it on the first dollar that he imposes upon any property in his district, pay it also upon the last dollar that he assesses on property in that district.

I think, however, it is not necessary to secure honest service. If you think you are going to employ in the collection of this revenue a class of men whose consciences are to be rectified and guided by a commission of one half per cent. on the amount of money they can get, I believe you had better employ another class of men or give up the idea of pretending to collect revenue in this way. You must bid higher if your men are going to be made honest by the amount of your compensation; you must bid higher, or else you will be outbid. The men who have the taxes to pay will pay more than one half per cent. for a dishonest administration of the office. I think, therefore, it is inexpedient to attempt to secure an honest administration of this office by holding out any such inducements as these.

Now, is it a just measure of compensation anywhere for this class of duties? There are a few officers employed within the State of New York, and within the State of Massachusetts, that is, in the city of New York and in the city of Boston, and in some other cities, who receive as high or a higher salary than $4,000 per annum. There are but few of the Governors in the northern States, I think, who receive so high a salary as $4,000. With the exception of the collector of the customs, I think there is no man employed in the collection of that branch of our revenue in the city of New York who receives anything like $4,000. That is my recollection about it; but I do not speak with any confidence, because I have not looked at the book.

I believe we are mistaken in supposing that the largest revenues are secured from districts in the largest cities. That matter was not considered, I believe, in committee; we had no statistics in regard to it. I have looked at some of the returns as they have been published, although they are partial and incomplete; and according to my recollection we get the largest revenues in several cases from country districts where the reason for these high salaries on the score of the cost of living does not obtain. It is said that we cannot in the city of New York and the city of Boston and in other cities secure the class of service we want in these offices for a salary so low as $1,500. I have been advised by persons residing in those cities that that is a mistake, that we can get them, and that the very class of men who are employed ordinarily in this kind of duty in these offices are a class of men who before they received these appointments were actually earning less money.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We want to get a better class.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know that any one of these offices has ever been tendered to any man who has refused it because the salary was not sufficient; and if you raise the salary I do not know that these offices will be tendered to any different class of men or any different style of men. I have no reason to believe that, and I do not believe it. I hope, therefore, as I said in the outset, that this amendment will not be agreed to unless the Senate think it is sensible. If they think so, I shall not be particularly sorry; but if they disagree to the amendment, I shall want a new amendment offered which will prevent these high salaries.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten of section twenty-two, to strike out "three" and insert "four;" so as to make the clause read:

But the salary of no assessor shall in any case exceed the sum of $4,000.

Mr. GRIMES. On that question I want a division of the Senate by the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I really hope the Senate will adopt the amendment. There is very great doubt whether $3,000 is enough in some cases; and if we adopt the amendment we can hereafter, when we come to the discussion of the matters wherein we differ from the House of Representatives, settle it back to $3,000 if it is then thought that $4,000 is too much; but if we fix it at $3,000 now there will be nothing to discuss and the matter will be settled. The Committee on Finance became convinced of the propriety of this change. I think that after discussion there was no objection in the committee by anybody to fixing the maximum at the rate named in this amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. There is a little responsibility devolving upon the members of the Senate as well as upon the committee of conference that will be constituted by the House of Representatives and the Senate hereafter, and I choose to let my constituents know how I vote on a question of this sort. I do not agree with the chairman of the Committee on Finance that $3,000 is less than ought to be paid to any one of these officers. I know very well that it is more than is received by men performing corresponding duty in civil life in New York. There are men who receive much larger sums of money, given in a great degree as gratuities, in some instances because of the extraordinary character that they possess, being placed at the head of some sort of corporation; but we have an illustration of the point that I make, here in this city. It is only a few months ago since the principal man in the sub-Treasurer's office in the city of New York, a gentleman whom I have heard spoken of, and I think I have heard the chairman of the Committee on Finance speak of him, as one of the most accomplished officers in that establishment in New York, was brought here and made Assistant Secretary of the Treasury at a salary of $3,000. It is said that we do not want men to perform the duties of assessor similar to those who are performing the duties of cashiers. I apprehend that most of the men who are capable of performing the duties of a teller or cashier in a bank can be made in a very short time capable of performing the duties of an assessor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that I am informed by the Senator from New York [Mr. MORGAN] that the average pay of cashiers of banks in the city of New York is $6,000 a year.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to have the Senator from New York state how much bank tellers are paid. This man is not responsible for any public money. He merely performs clerical duties. He goes through the city and makes assessments. Why should we pay him such an exorbitant sum? Because of any responsibility that he assumes to the Government? Not at all. I do not think that his responsibilities to the Government are any greater than the tellers in a bank or the book-keeper in any private establishment in New York to their employers. I am unwilling that this question shall go to a committee of conference to be decided until there shall first be an opportunity for every member of the Senate to set himself right on the record.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have not the slightest objection to the yeas and nays, and if the Senator wants to set himself right I have no objection to that. I did not speak on that account. I simply said that I hoped the Senate, on the yeas and nays, would not adopt the views of the honorable Senator from Iowa, and I trust so still. That is all I said.

I of course have no sort of feeling or wish upon the matter. The idea is that an assessor is a very important officer. If the Senator from Iowa has examined this bill and knows what is in it he must be aware that the duties of the assessor are great and varied, requiring not only integrity but capacity of a high order so far as judgment, discretion, clearness of view, and all those qualities which go to the making up of a very able man of business are concerned. As a general rule, so far as I had anything to do with it in my own State, I endeavored to select for these offices a very superior set of men, and I think we succeeded in doing it in the State of Maine; I do not know how it is elsewhere. Now, sir, to compare a man having the charge of such important interests, requiring so much ability and so much character, to a mere teller of a bank, who has simply to count money from day to day, is to my mind an absurdity.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator allow me then to put another case? Let him compare them with the Comptrollers and Auditors of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Compare them with those. Some of them receive more than three thousand dollars salary. The First Comptroller receives $3,500; the Comptroller of the Currency receives $5,000; we have men here who receive much larger sums than the amount here fixed; but that is no argument on the subject. We know very well how the class of officers referred to, who receive $3,000, complain of the smallness of their pay; but they have a set of duties to perform which are not of the nature to be performed by these officers.

But, sir, I am not disposed to argue the matter. Every Senator will judge for himself. I only know that on looking at the whole subject, as I said before, we came to the conclusion to propose this amendment, and also for the reason that we thought it ought to be open for some discussion after the communications we had upon the subject and the views expressed, especially in the present state of things. Senators are aware that $3,000 now is not more than $2,000 would be at an ordinary time, so that in fact when you fix a man's salary at $3,000, it is equal to saying $2,000 in an ordinary time; and we had that in view also, and we must conform in some degree to these circumstances.

Mr. HOWE. I rise simply to correct a statement of fact. The Senator from Maine was under the impression that there was no opposition to this amendment in the committee, that the committee were entirely unanimous upon it. I believe he certainly is mistaken as far as my own action is concerned, and I think as far as one other member of the committee is concerned; I think the Senator from Ohio did not agree to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Ohio expressly agreed to it.

Mr. HOWE. I cannot speak with certainty as to him.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Van Winkle—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Ramsey, Wade, and Wilkinson—9. ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Doollittle, Harding, Hicks, Howard, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Salsbury, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it in order now to change the amount named in lines five and six of the section? I desire to increase the amount to $200,000. In country districts I think the salary is sufficient. There will be very few districts under this bill where the pay will be above $3,000. If it is in order, I would move to increase the minimum of the amount of collections named to $200,000. I think that in country districts where labor is cheap and provisions and rents are cheap the minimum compensation fixed is sufficient, and nearly all the districts will yield $200,000 revenue. I move, in line five, to raise the minimum to $200,000 instead of $100,000. I think there are certain city districts where the compensation of $3,000 would be inadequate, and therefore I voted for the proposition to increase the rate in certain districts, but I think that $1,500 is sufficient in ordinary country districts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that would be very hard on them.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are entitled to their postage; and their office rent and all incidental expenses are provided for in this same section. The law allows them a fixed compensation of $1,500, and then if they collect over $200,000 they get one half of one per cent. until they reach the maximum of $4,000. If my amendment is adopted, in the country districts where the collections are less than $200,000 they would only get their salary and expenses. I think that is enough in a country district.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. I voted with some reluctance to retain $4,000 as the highest salary of an assessor. It ought to be remembered by the Senate that in some of the districts that are rather large in territorial extent, but where small amounts will be collected, the assessors, if the Senate should change this minimum to $200,000, will have nothing except the salary fixed by the bill. The responsibility will be very great; they will have to travel over a very large district of country necessarily, and especially to get the income tax.

Mr. SHERMAN. All that is done by the assistant assessors.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is as much responsibility on the assessor. He has to see that the returns and everything are correctly made. There is as much responsibility there as in a case where the district is compact and the receipts large. Neither will handle any money. I think it would be much better to reduce the maximum amount of the salary to $3,000, as proposed by the Senator from Iowa, than to extend the minimum of collections to $200,000, because it will affect assessors in a great many cases where it ought not to be done. I hope the amendment will not be made.

Mr. WILKINSON. This amendment of the Senator from Ohio will operate very harshly on the districts where there is the most labor to be performed. Take my State, if you please, where there are two districts, either of which comprises a territory larger than Connecticut and Massachusetts combined, and the assessors have to travel over that entire country, it being sparsely settled and an agricultural community.

Mr. SHERMAN. The assessor does not travel.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He must go into every county to hear appeals.

Mr. SHERMAN. But he does not go around to make assessments. He has assistant assessors.

Mr. WILKINSON. There are twenty large counties in one district of our State three hundred miles in extent one way and one hundred and fifty miles the other way.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know how it may be in Minnesota or any other State; but I had occasion last fall to travel all over or nearly all over the State of Iowa, and I took the trouble to inquire as to the operation of this law; and if I had not taken that trouble there was such universal indignation in some parts of the State as to the administration of it on the part of the deputy assessors, that my attention could not but have been called very strongly to it. I found that under the law—I do not know whether the construction was correct or not that had been placed on it—there was a deputy assessor in almost every county, whether there was any amount of revenue collected in the county or not, and that in almost every instance the deputy assessors had charged a per diem ranging from fifteen up to twenty-five days in a month, although the receipts from the entire county into the Treasury of the United States would not be more than half enough to pay the per diem. One great argument that was urged to me, especially by some of the collectors, was—I do not know whether that is remedied by this bill—that the assessors were allowed to pay their own deputy assessors and to audit the accounts. I remember very well that a collector told me that if he was permitted to audit the accounts of the deputy assessors, they would not be permitted to gouge the Treasury in the manner in which they were doing. I do not know whether that has been obviated by this bill or not. I believe I called the attention of one member of the committee to it in the early part of the session. The account was approved by the assessor, the man who made the appointment.

Mr. HENDERSON. He cannot make the appointment under this bill.

Mr. GRIMES. He will make it virtually under this bill. The appointment will be made, on the designation of the assessor, by the Secretary of the Treasury or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The right way I think is to have the accounts of the deputy assessors audited by somebody else than the chief assessor himself, the man from whom hitherto the appointment has emanated, and from whom it will hereafter virtually emanate. It is true that under the law the chief assessor of the district is required to go into each county once a year to hear appeals from the deputy assessors, but he only goes where appeals are made. In the sparsely settled counties in Minnesota and Iowa there is not an appeal made in one county out of twenty-five. I have never known an appeal made in my State from the deputy assessor to the assessor.

Mr. WILKINSON. I never heard of one in our State.

Mr. GRIMES. If there is no appeal taken, the assessor is not required to go into any other county in the district than the one in which he resides.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My great objection to this amendment is that there are very few districts, comparatively speaking, taking the country through, where we collect above one hundred thousand dollars. Is it not an object, is it not desirable that we should hold out some inducement to assessors to bring this matter up just as high as they can? We know as a matter of fact that there are very few districts where the amount comes up to $200,000. If you allow only a fixed salary, you hold out no sort of inducement to the assessor to go beyond it, to be strenuous and careful in the discharge of his duties. You must take men in this world as you find them and as they are; and the ground upon which the percentage was fixed was expressly with a view to hold out a further inducement to assessors to do their duty carefully, because if they get up beyond a certain point they receive a percentage on receipts.

I believe that we should make twenty or fifty dollars where we lose one in the payment of salaries, by retaining the principle which I contend for in that single provision, by providing that the assessor if he brings his assessments in a district up to a certain point shall receive a percentage. I deem it to be exceedingly important. My best judgment on the subject, after the most careful deliberation I could give it, is that we miss it by being so very particular about these small percentages, which are paid in reality as an inducement to men to put in process of collection all they can. Fifteen hundred dollars may be pay enough if you appoint a man who is to sit down quietly in his office and send his assistant assessors around, and have them make their returns, and he simply hear appeals from them, and do no more. That may be well for him; but is it well for us, is it well for the Treasury, is it well for the revenue of the country? That is the question, and it is that consideration which influences me in advising that this feature be retained as it is.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out "$3 50" and insert "four dollars," in line twenty-two of section twenty-two; so as to read:

And there shall be allowed and paid to each assistant assessor four dollars for every day actually employed in collecting lists and making valuations, the number of days necessary for that purpose to be certified by the assessor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish the attention of the Senate to the pay of these assistant assessors. There are a great number of them, and consequently, though the increase to each is but small per day, it may make a large sum in the aggregate. This is not all the compensation of the assistant assessor, because the bill provides that he shall have three dollars for every hundred persons assessed on the tax list, as completed and delivered by him, and he is entitled to twenty-five cents for each permit granted to any tobacco, snuff, or cigar manufacturer.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How many districts are there where there is such a manufacturer?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not an important item, I know; but the other item of three dollars for every one hundred persons assessed is very important, in addition to postage, office rent, and stamps.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The assistant assessors have no such allowances; they are only for the assessor.

Mr. SHERMAN. The provision is:

And there shall be allowed and paid to each assistant assessor four dollars for every day actually employed in collecting lists and making valuations, the number of days necessary for that purpose to be certified by the assessor, and three dollars for every hundred persons assessed contained in the tax list as completed and delivered by him to the assessor, and twenty-five cents for each permit granted to any tobacco, snuff, or cigar manufacturer; and the said assessors and assistant assessors, respectively, shall be allowed, after the account thereof shall have been rendered and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury, their necessary and reasonable charges for stationery and blank-books used in the discharge of their duties, and for postage actually paid on letters and documents received or sent, and relating exclusively to official business.

I did not mean to say that the assistant assessor is entitled to office rent, but he is to books, stationery, postage, and incidental expenses. He is entitled not only to three dollars for every hundred names returned by him on the tax list and to incidental expenses, but there is another provision that an increase may be allowed in certain cases by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is only in certain States.

Mr. SHERMAN. The pay of the assistant will really amount in some cases to more than the pay of the assessor. Take the case of a district where the pay of the assessor is $1,500, and the amount collected is $100,000. In such a district as that the pay of the assistant, if employed the year round, is higher than the pay of the principal assessor. Four dollars a day for thirty days is $120 a month. It is higher than persons performing similar duties are paid in any of the western States. Perhaps in some of the eastern States they get as much, but it is much more than is paid in any State West, including the State of Ohio.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I see, Mr. President, that I may have very hard work of it in getting through with this bill. I thought that I represented the committee, and the Senate seem to be very well satisfied with the committee's report; but on the right hand and on the left I find gentlemen of the committee meeting me in the Senate upon matters which were thoroughly discussed and decided by the committee. I thought I had a right to call for their aid to support me. I have excused my friend from Wisconsin, however, in the particular case that he suggested, because he gave notice that he was opposed to the amendment of the committee and should oppose it here.

I can only say with regard to this question that the matter was thoroughly discussed in the committee when the Senator from Ohio was present, and it was decided there that under the circumstances of the case, in view of the considerations that I have suggested, it was best to raise this pay. The Senate will do as they please about it. My opinion remains the same in regard to it. Considering the number of days these men are employed, their aggregate pay is not large. If there is fraud about it, if the assessors allow them more days than they ought to have, that cannot be helped here. My friend from Iowa says it is so, and particularly in the State of Iowa. I am sorry to hear that there is such a state of morals there that better officers cannot be found to discharge the duties of their offices under this law. I do not think it is so in my own State. I do not know what kind of men my friend recommended for appointment to office there under this law. I believe the bill is right as it stands, as we have reported it, and I hope the Senate will sustain it.

Mr. GRIMES. When the news came in from the battle out West the other day, the Senator from Maine boasted that the State of Maine had furnished a large population to the State of Iowa, and perhaps that fact will account for the conduct of the assessors in the State of Iowa. [Laughter.] I have only stated here to-day what I have been told by the collectors and gentlemen who are familiar with this subject, and my testimony has been vouched by a Senator who lives on the Atlantic coast and sits behind me, and I think that those gentlemen who will take the trouble to examine the records in the Treasury will find that such is the case in every State in the Union, that a very large number of assessors in the agricultural counties where there has been comparatively no money received and paid into the Treasury have been drawing compensation where there was actually no service rendered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the fault of the assessor. We must trust somebody.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know how it may be in other sections of the country; but in my region these deputy assessors are merchants or lawyers or doctors in some remote county in the district, and while they act as deputy assessors they perform their regular legitimate business. The performance of this duty does not interfere in the remotest degree with their regular business; and yet it is now proposed to pay them four dollars a day for as many days as they shall certify to the man who appoints them—

Mr. TRUMBULL. They are to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury hereafter.

Mr. GRIMES. But does not the Senator know how those appointments will be made? On the designation of the assessor; and I believe we do not require these gentlemen to swear (as you require every man who pays taxes to support these men to swear) that they have actually been employed during the days they draw pay.

Mr. HOWE. I have got such an amendment to propose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They take an oath to discharge their duties faithfully.

Mr. GRIMES. They take an oath at the commencement when they first enter on their duties that they will discharge them faithfully; but they are not obliged to take an oath to the verification of their accounts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not disposed to talk much more about this matter; but I protest against Iowa being made the particular illustration of every part of the country in this respect. We must provide necessarily for all; and how much is four dollars a day to pay to men in your large cities for the few days they are employed, and the kind of men you want, even with what they get for the lists? In your large cities and large manufacturing places you want men who are almost if not quite equal to the assessor himself in capacity. What kind of men can you employ for the very small sum fixed in such cases? If they were employed the year round this amount would be enough. It is unquestionably true that in some cases there are impositions; but you collect the great amount of your revenue in the cities and in the manufacturing towns, and we must act according to the necessities of the case with a view to the very subject of revenue itself, and that was the idea upon which the committee went.

Mr. HOWE. I am entirely satisfied that four dollars a day is not too high for this class of employees. I know I have the permission of the chairman to oppose this amendment, but this is not one of the amendments I wanted to oppose; I did not oppose it in committee. I know so far as I am acquainted with these assistant assessors that they are not the class of men alluded to by the Senator from Iowa. They cannot devote a day to this duty but it takes them from their regular employment. For instance, the assistant assessor in the county in which I live is a lawyer, an industrious, hard-working man. He has to travel over a large tract of country. He has not a horse and carriage; he has to hire one at the livery stable to go into a remote part of the county. He cannot devote a day to this duty without paying out of his pocket nearly the whole amount of his compensation. He cannot go to a livery stable and hire a horse and carriage, ride out into the country through the various towns, maintain his horse, and get a dinner for himself, without expending nearly four dollars.

Mr. DAVIS. He ought to have a horse. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Kentucky says he ought to have a horse. I think so myself, and the Government ought to give him one, [laughter,] but I do not feel disposed to propose an amendment of that sort. I think you ought to pay him a sum which will enable him to hire one, for I do not think you ought to compel him to go on foot.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I have prepared several amendments, intended to guard against the abuse of which the Senator from Iowa spoke, and I will offer them now, or defer them—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should prefer that the Senator would defer them until the amendments of the committee shall have been disposed of.

Mr. HOWE. Very well; but let me suggest a couple of verbal alterations.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall be obliged to the Senator if he will do so.

Mr. HOWE. In lines thirty and thirty-one the section reads, "shall be allowed, after the account thereof shall have been rendered and approved by the proper officers." I propose to alter "allowed" to "paid," and to insert "to" after "rendered."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The alterations proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The next amendment of the committee was in line forty of section twenty-two, to strike out the word "in" before "continuance."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment will be made.

The next amendment was in line fifty-two of section twenty-two, to strike out the word "two" and insert "to."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment will be made.

The next amendment was to insert the words "revenue agents and inspectors" after the word "assessors" in line fifty-three of section twenty-two, and to strike out the words "the States of" before "Louisiana" in line fifty-four; so as to make the proviso read:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to fix such additional rates of compensation to be made to assessors and assistant assessors in cases where a collection district embraces more than a single congressional district, and to assessors and assistant assessors, revenue agents and inspectors in Louisiana, North Carolina, Mississippi, Tennessee, Missouri, California, and Oregon, and the Territories, as may appear to him to be just and equitable, in consequence of the greater cost of living and traveling in those States and Territories, and as may, in his judgment, be necessary to secure the services of competent officers; but the rates of compensation thus allowed shall not exceed the rates paid to similar officers in such States and Territories respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Before we pass from section twenty-two I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether, having limited the gross amount of compensation of assessors, a limit should not also be put upon that of the assistant assessors. There is no limit in the section to the aggregate compensation that assistant assessors may obtain.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The reason is that they are only paid for the days they are actually employed.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I merely submit if it is not desirable to impose some limit.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know how it could be done very well, because that would depend on the circumstances in each case.

The next amendment of the committee was in section twenty-four, line three, to strike out "one thousand" and insert "fifteen hundred;" so as to read:

That there shall be allowed to collectors, in full compensation for their services and that of their deputies, a salary of $1,500 per annum, to be paid quarterly, and in addition thereto a commission, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line five of the same section, after the word "of" to strike out "two and one half of one" and insert "three;" so that the clause would read:

And in addition thereto a commission of three per cent. upon the $100,000.

Mr. WILKINSON. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. Under the old law there was four per cent. allowed upon the first $100,000. In some of the districts in the new States the collections are not large. Take the largest district in the State of Minnesota, and I think it pays but a little over sixty thousand dollars; and yet the collector in that district has actually paid out, as I know—for he lives in the town where I reside—to the deputy collectors every cent of the four per cent. that was coming to him, and also several hundred dollars out of his pocket, relying on the general clause giving the Secretary of the Treasury the power to allow such further salary as he should deem proper.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will perceive that we increase instead of diminish the pay.

Mr. WILKINSON. I see you allow $1,500 per annum, but you strike down the percentage to three per cent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. By the last bill there was no salary whatever.

Mr. WILKINSON. I understand that. Now, in this district to which my attention has been called the collector gets nothing at all under the law. The difference between two and a half per cent. and three per cent. on $60,000 would be $300. The duties of this officer are just as arduous and more so than the duties of a collector in a large city or a county where he would collect $500,000. He has a vast extent of country to attend to, and there is no earthly reason why he should not be reasonably paid. It seems to me that this $1,500 is to pay for all the services of the collector and deputy collectors. It says "that there shall be allowed to collectors, in full compensation for their services and that of their deputies."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to suggest that as the bill comes from the House of Representatives the percentage is two and a half per cent.? We propose to increase it to three per cent., the Senator will observe, thus enlarging the House proposition.

Mr. WILKINSON. I find I am mistaken and the committee are right as far as they go, but they ought to go further and allow the rate fixed by the existing law, four per cent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will be at liberty after we get through the amendments of the committee to move to strike out the whole clause as amended if he pleases, and to make the percentage more, but of course he does not object to our amendment.

Mr. WILKINSON. That did not occur to me in reading it. I only saw that it was a reduction from four as the law now is to three per cent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think there is force in what the Senator from Minnesota has said; and in the country districts, especially in large districts of country, the collectors, as he has very truly remarked, receive nothing. I know a collector in the State of Illinois, a very honest, correct, faithful, and truthful man as I think, who has sent me a statement of the transactions in his collection district showing that he paid out to his deputies and for the expenses of his office more than he actually received as compensation. In a district where $50,000 is collected the collector will receive just $1,500 under this provision. There are many districts where there are no more than fifty or one hundred thousand dollars collected. I think that four per cent. on the first $100,000 would not be unreasonable, and I think that is the way it was in the old bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But that did not allow the $1,500.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If you allow three per cent., and $50,000 is collected, I suppose the collector would not get the three per cent. besides the $1,500.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, he would.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is it the intention of the committee, that he shall have the $1,500 and the three per cent. additional?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly, and we fixed it in that way on careful consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I supposed the $1,500 would be deducted out of the three per cent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all. If he collects $50,000 he will get $1,500 salary, and the three per cent. would be $1,500 more, so that his pay would be $3,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to it with that understanding.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have made it so that I think it ought to be satisfactory all around.

Mr. WILKINSON. I still believe that in those districts where there is less than one hundred thousand dollars collected four per cent. should be allowed in addition to the salary, for this reason: those are districts of vast territorial extent, and where the collector is obliged in consequence of the great extent of the territory to employ a large number of deputies. In the large towns, for instance in a congressional district in the city of New York, $1,000,000 may be received and the collector's percentage will amount to a vast sum, while a collector in a district in a new State where there is but little received has a vast amount of territory to look to and just as much labor to perform as if he collected a larger amount of money.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I propose the same verbal amendments in this section that I did to the section in regard to assessors. I move to strike out "allowed" and to insert "paid," in the fourteenth line, and to insert "to" after "rendered," in the same line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those amendments will be made if there be no objection.

The next amendment of the committee was in section twenty-four, line twenty-one, to strike out the word "cases" and insert "States and Territories;" so as to read:

Provided, however, That the salary and commissions of no collector, except in the States and Territories mentioned in the proviso, &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that had better not be agreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in the twenty-fourth line of the same section, after the word "than," to strike out "four" and insert "five;" so that the clause will read:

* * * That the salary and commissions of no collector * * * shall exceed $10,000 in the aggregate, nor more than $5,000 exclusive of the expenses for deputies and clerks, to which such collector is actually and necessarily subjected in the administration of his office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following proviso after "office" in line twenty-seven:

Provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to allow any collector more than $4,000 per annum, exclusive of stationery, blank-books, and postage, and pay of deputies and clerks.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section twenty-five, line three, after the word "revenue," to insert "which shall accrue after the 30th of June, 1864," and in line five, after the word "compensation," to insert "for services after that date;" so that the clause will read:

That in the adjustment of the accounts of assessors and collectors of internal revenue, which shall accrue after the 30th of June, 1864, and in the payment of their compensation for services after that date, the fiscal year of the Treasury shall be observed, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the section:

And the salary and commissions of assessors and collectors heretofore earned and accrued shall be adjusted, allowed, and paid in conformity to the provisions of this section, and not otherwise.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section twenty-six, line three, after the word "assessors," to strike out "respectively."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out in line four "given on" and insert "made upon;" and in line five to strike out "such" and insert "each;" and in line nine to strike out "given on" and insert "made upon."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment will be made if there be no objection.

The next amendment was in section twenty-seven, to strike out the words "respectively as aforesaid" after "assessors" in line three.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines eighteen, twenty-two, and twenty-seven respectively of section twenty-seven to strike out "summons" and insert "notice."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out in lines thirty, thirty-one, and thirty-two of section twenty-seven the words, "but no such summons shall be necessary in respect to annual taxes assessed upon any property or articles included in schedule A of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "assessor," in line thirty-eight, to strike out "or within twenty days from and after receiving the list thereof from the assessor," and in line forty-two, after the word "annual," to strike out "and" and insert "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifty, after the word "chattels," to strike out "which may be."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there is no objection. The Chair hears none.

The next amendment was in section twenty-nine, line twenty, after the word "the" to strike out "place of residence of the person whose;" and after "estate," in line twenty-one, to strike out "shall be;" so as to make the clause read:

And the said officer shall also cause a notification to the same effect to be published in some newspaper within the county where such seizure is made, if any such there be, and shall also cause a like notice to be posted up at the post office nearest to the estate so seized, and in two other public places within the county.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-three of section twenty-nine, to insert after "seized" the words "except by special order of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue;" so as to read:

And the place of said sale shall not be more than five miles distant from the estate seized, except by special order of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line sixty-nine of section twenty-nine after the word "person" to insert "or for which any person may be liable."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section twenty-nine, line one hundred and eight, after the word "accrued," to strike out the word "in" and to insert the word "at."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-three, line seven, after the word "credited," to insert "with all payments of duties or taxes collected;" so that it will read:

That each collector shall be charged with the whole amount of taxes, whether contained in lists delivered to him by the assessors, respectively, or delivered or transmitted to him by assistant assessors from time to time, or by other collectors, and with the additions thereto, and amount of penalties or forfeitures collected, and shall be credited with all payments of duties or taxes collected, and with the amount of duties or taxes contained in the lists transmitted in the manner above provided to other collectors, and by them receipted as aforesaid.

Mr. HOWE. I do not like the phraseology of that amendment, because it does not specify where these payments are to be made. I do not know how to state the objection, because I purpose by and by, after I have an opportunity to consult with the chairman, to move some amendments requiring all these payments to be made into the Treasury or the several depositories selected by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This would cover all everywhere. They are ordered to be paid as it stands now.

Mr. HOWE. I see it would; but the question is, how complete will be our control over it if we now adopt this amendment. It is, I think, a very serious objection to the bill as it stands that it leaves this matter under the control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will observe that the particular clause on which we are now acting is merely settling the principles on which the accounts shall be settled, and has nothing to do with the person who is to receive the payments.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-three, line eleven, after the word "also," to strike out the word "for" and insert "with;" so that it will read:

And also with the duties or taxes of such persons as may have absconded or become insolvent prior to the day when the duty or tax ought, according to the provisions of this act, to have been collected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-three, line fifteen, to strike out the words "First Comptroller of the Treasury" and to insert "Commissioner of Internal Revenue;" and in line eighteen, after the word "recovered," to insert "who shall certify the facts to the First Comptroller of the Treasury;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that due diligence was used by the collector, and that no property was left from which the duty or tax could have been recovered, who shall certify the facts to the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the chairman would pass over that amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I can explain it.
Mr. HOWE. Very well.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is only putting in the shape of a law what is now the practice. The papers are all in the possession of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but the accounts are settled before the First Comptroller of the Treasury. He settles the principles upon which these settlements are to be made; but the facts with regard to the settlement of the accounts are in the possession of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the necessary information must be obtained from him. On consultation and full investigation this provision was found to be essential in order that the First Comptroller of the Treasury may have the proper information as to the facts to enable him to settle the principles and settle the accounts. I think it is right as it is. It is according to the practice.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator to make a memorandum of that amendment, and if he finds it is not right, when we get into the Senate he can correct it there.

The next amendment was in section thirty-four, line eleven, after the word "paid," to insert the words "over by him."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-four, line thirty-six, to strike out the words "may and" before the words "shall be sold."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-five, line two, after the word "shall," to strike out the words "exercise or;" in line seven to strike out the word "fail," and insert the words "willfully neglect;" in line eight to strike out the word "their," and insert "his" before the word "compensation;" and in line sixteen, after the word "court," to strike out the words "and the said court shall also render judgment against said collector or deputy collector for double the amount of damages accruing to the party injured, to be collected by execution;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 35. And be it further enacted, That each and every collector, or his deputy, who shall be guilty of any extortion or willful oppression, under color of law, or shall knowingly demand other or greater sums than shall be authorized by law, or shall receive any fee, compensation, or reward, except as herein prescribed, for the performance of any duty, or shall willfully neglect to perform any of the duties enjoined by this act, shall, upon conviction, be subject to a fine of $500 and to a forfeiture of his compensation, or to be imprisoned for one year, or both, at the discretion of the court, and be dismissed from office, and be forever thereafter incapable of holding any office under the Government; and one half of the fine so imposed shall be for the use of the United States, and the other half for the use of the informer, who shall be ascertained by the judgment of the court. And each and every collector, or his deputies, shall give receipts for all sums by them collected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of section thirty-six the following proviso:

Provided, however, That when such premises shall be open at night such officers may enter while so open in the performance of their official duties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-seven, line three, after the word "collector" to insert the words "or inspector;" so that it will read:

* That if any person shall forcibly obstruct or hinder any assessor or assistant assessor, or any collector or deputy collector, or inspector, in the execution of this act, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-seven, line ten, to strike out the word "amount," and insert the word "value;" so that it will read:

The person so offending shall, upon conviction thereof, for every such offense forfeit and pay the sum of $500, or double the value of property so rescued, or be imprisoned for a term not exceeding two years, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. HOWE. I suggest whether the words "revenue agent" should not be inserted after "collector," in the third line of that section, and before the words "or inspector," that have just been inserted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it would be well to do so.

Mr. HOWE. Then I move to insert the words "revenue agent."

Mr. FESSENDEN. A revenue agent, however, is a mere officer to look after them, to see that their duties are performed, and to give information, and would hardly come within the meaning of the section.

Mr. HOWE. He has about the same class of duties to perform as the inspector.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to it, if the Senator thinks it necessary.

Mr. HOWE. I move to insert the words "revenue agent" before the words "or inspector" in the third line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-eight, line six, to strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and;" and in lines seven, eight, and nine, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That information thereof be immediately communicated to the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall not be disapproved by him.

So that the section will read:

SEC. 38. And be it further enacted, That in case of the sickness or temporary disability of a collector to discharge such of his duties as cannot under existing laws be discharged by a deputy, they may be devolved by him upon one of his deputies; and for the official acts and defaults of such deputy the collector and his sureties shall be held responsible to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirty-nine, line three, to strike out the words "their successors are" and to insert "his successor is;" in line five, after the word "preceding," to strike out the words "may and;" in line twelve, after the word "shall," to strike out the words "in like manner;" in line fourteen to strike out the word "such," and insert the letter "a;" in line fifteen to strike out the words "the fifth section of;" in line seventeen to strike out the word "proper" before the word "deputy;" and in line eighteen to strike out the word "so" before the word "succeeding;" so that the section will read:

That in case a collector shall die, resign, or be removed, the deputies of such collector shall continue to act until his successor is appointed; and the deputy of such collector longest in service at the time immediately preceding shall, until a successor shall be appointed, discharge all the duties of said collector; and for the official acts and defaults of such deputy a remedy shall be had on the official bond of the collector, as in other cases; and of two or more deputy collectors, appointed on the same day, the one residing nearest the residence of the collector at the time of his death, resignation, or removal, shall discharge the said duties until the appointment of a successor. And any bond or security taken from a deputy by such collector, pursuant to this act, shall be available to his legal representatives and sureties to indemnify them for loss or damage accruing from any act of the deputy so continuing or succeeding to the duties of such collector.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section forty, line five, after the words "recovery of," to strike out the words "the same, and for the recovery of;" and in line nine, after the word "shall," to strike out the words "and may;" so that it will read:

That it shall be the duty of the collectors aforesaid, or their deputies, in their respective districts, and they are hereby authorized, to collect all the duties and taxes imposed by this act, however the same may be designated, and to prosecute for the recovery of any sum or sums which may be forfeited by virtue of this act; and all fines, penalties, and forfeitures which may be incurred or imposed by virtue of this act shall be sued for and recovered in the name of the United States, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of section forty the following words:

Nor shall the fees of any attorney or counsel employed by any such officer be allowed in the settlement of his account, unless the employment of such attorney or counsel shall be authorized by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, either express or by general regulations.

Mr. HOWE. I will not move an amendment to that amendment; but I think these last words "or by general regulations" ought to be stricken out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The reason of that is, that this country is so large you cannot very well get intelligence of these suits in sufficient season. The clause is drawn with reference to California and the Pacific coast. You must make some regulations under which those cases may be allowed.

Mr. HOWE. I should think we were as competent to make general regulations as the Commissioner.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But we have not time to do it, and do not understand the cases. They must be made in different cases.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. It is twenty minutes to five o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does not the Senator think we had better go on until five o'clock? I should like to get as far as the whisky this afternoon. [Laughter.]

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 24, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. Hosmer, of Buffalo, New York. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DAKOTA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Elections, submitted the following resolutions; which were laid upon the table, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That William Jayne is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from the Territory of Dakota in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

Resolved, That J. B. S. Todd is entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from the Territory of Dakota in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

BANK BILL.

Mr. HOOPER. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order to be the unfinished business of yesterday, being the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 395, "to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof."

Mr. HOOPER. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move a non-concurrence in all the amendments of the Senate, and to ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. KERNAN. I hope that we will at least have the amendments read.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen can have a separate vote on each amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order on this bill as to whether it provides a tax or not; and that if it does it must, under the rules, have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I make the point especially in reference to Senate amendment on page 35. I ask that the section may be read, so that the point may be fairly presented to the House.

Mr. FENTON. This is a House bill, and the proposition has been considered already in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is a House bill coming back to us from the Senate with amendments. I do not think, therefore, that the gentleman's point is a good one.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment, and then the Chair will decide.

The Clerk read, as follows:

And in lieu of all existing taxes, every association shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States, in the months of January and July, a duty of one half of one per cent. each half year from and after the 1st day of January, 1864, upon the average amount of its notes in circulation, and a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year upon the average amount of its deposits, and a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year, as aforesaid, on the average amount of its capital stock beyond the amount invested in United States bonds; and in case of default in the payment thereof by any association, the duties aforesaid may be collected in the manner provided for the collection of United States duties of other corporations, or the Treasurer may reserve the amount of said duties out of the interest, as it may become due, on the bonds deposited with him by such defaulting association. And it shall be the duty of each association, within ten days from the 1st days of January and July of each year, to make a return, under the oath of its president or cashier, to the Treasurer of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, of the average amount of its notes in circulation, and of the average amount of its deposits, and of the average amount of its capital stock, beyond the amount invested in United States bonds, for the six months next preceding said 1st days of January and July as aforesaid, and in default of such return, and for each default thereof, each defaulting association shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of $200, to be collected either out of the interest as it may become due such association on the bonds deposited with the Treasurer, or, at his option, in the manner in which penalties are to be collected of other corporations under the laws of the United States; and in case of such default the amount of the duties to be paid by such association shall be assessed upon the amount of notes delivered to such association by the Comptroller of the Currency, and upon the highest amount of its deposits and capital stock, to be ascertained in such other manner as the Treasurer may deem best: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the market value of the shares in any of the said associations, held by any person or body corporate, from being included in the valuation of the personal property of such person or corporation in the assessment of all taxes imposed by or under State authority for State, county, or municipal purposes, but not at greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State. And all the remedies provided by State laws for the collection of such taxes shall be applicable thereto: Provided further, That no tax shall be imposed under the laws of any State upon the shares in any of the associations authorized by this act at a rate exceeding that imposed upon the shares in banks organized under authority of the State where such association is located: Provided, also, That nothing in this act shall exempt the real estate of associations from either State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real estate is taxed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order on the 110th rule, which I believe is the only one applicable to the subject.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] makes the point of order that the Senate amendment which has just been read, being a tax upon national banks, is a tax under the 110th rule of the House, and must be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair overrules the point of order, as he did when the bill was previously pending before the House. The language of the 110th rule is that—

"No motion or proposition for a tax or charge upon the people shall be discussed the day on which it is made or offered; and every such proposition shall receive its first discussion in a Committee of the Whole House."

The 111th rule provides that—

"No sum or quantum of tax or duty, voted by a Committee of the Whole House, shall be increased in the House until the motion or proposition for such increase shall be first discussed and voted in a Committee of the Whole House; and so in respect to the time of its continuance."

The 111th rule applies to all taxes or duties, whereas the 110th rule is limited by express language to a specified kind of tax, a tax upon the people. The Chair understands, and believes that he is sustained by the former practice, that this is not a charge or tax upon the people at large. One or two illustrations may be given. Congress has been in the habit of granting lands for railroads with the provision that these railroads shall carry troops and munitions of war of the United States free of charge. That is in the nature of a tax upon the railroad companies authorized by Congress for certain privileges granted. The Chair has examined the precedents, and such grants have not been regarded as a tax or charge upon the people requiring them to be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

These national banks are established by Congress, and it is provided that they shall pay a tax into the Treasury of the United States for privileges conferred upon them, and the Chair does not think that the provision is to be considered as a charge upon the people.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then the Speaker does not regard rule 111 as applicable to this case?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not.

Mr. HOOPER. I now demand the previous question on the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to move to non-concur in all the amendments of the Senate and to demand the previous question. I desire to ask whether, if the previous question is seconded, we may have a separate vote on each amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will be in the power of any member of the House to demand a separate vote.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Will this motion, if it prevails, cut off all discussion upon these amendments?

The SPEAKER. The previous question will of course cut off discussion.

Mr. KERNAN. And all amendment?

The SPEAKER. And all amendment; a separate vote, however, may be had on each amendment of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will it be in order to move to concur in any amendment?

The SPEAKER. The form of putting the question is, Will the House concur in the amendment?

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to make an inquiry. If the previous question is sustained shall we be allowed the same five minutes' debate which was permitted in the House upon the legislative bill yesterday?

The SPEAKER. Not if the previous question is sustained.

Mr. UPSON. Do I understand the Chair to say that after the previous question is sustained we can demand a separate vote upon each amendment?

The SPEAKER. A separate vote can be demanded on each amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand tellers on seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. FENTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 38.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question being on ordering the main question to be put,

Mr. FENTON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint Mr. BROOKS, and Mr. BALDWIN of Massachusetts.

Mr. BROOKS. I decline to act as a teller in the case, except by positive order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then appoint Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 31.

So the main question was ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to non-concur in the Senate amendments, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the amendments upon the table, and upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 56, nays 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chauncy, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazar, Long, Malby, Marey, McDowell, Middleton, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Strouse, Sweet, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—56.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Deasing, Dixon, Donnelly, Briggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Garfield, Gooch, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jackson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando, Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perkins, Pike, Powers, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu R. Washburn, William R. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—80.

So the House refused to lay the amendments on the table.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Pacific railroad bill was re-committed to the select committee.

The motion to reconsider was entered.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 300) for the classification of the clerks to paymasters in the Navy, and graduating their pay; and

An act (H. R. No. 15) to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana.

BANK BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a separate vote upon each Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments of the Senate.

First amendment of the Senate:

Page 2, line fourteen, strike out the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" and insert the words "upon reasons to be communicated by him to the Senate;" so that the clause will read:

He [the Comptroller of the Currency] shall be appointed by the President, on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold his office for the term of five years unless sooner removed by the President, upon reasons to be communicated by him to the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers upon the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and Mr. NOBLE, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 41.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

Page 2, line thirty, strike out the words "freeholders as" after the word "responsible," so that the clause will read:

And he [the Comptroller] shall give to the United States a bond in the penalty of $100,000, with not less than two responsible sureties, &c.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers on the amendment, and appointed Mr. BOYD and Mr. ELDRIDGE.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 44.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House concurred in the first amendment of the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House concurred in the second amendment of the Senate.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Third amendment:

Page 3, line seven, insert "not necessarily in the possession of engravers or printers;" so that the clause will read:

That there shall be assigned to the Comptroller of the Currency by the Secretary of the Treasury suitable rooms in the Treasury building for conducting the business of the Currency Bureau, in which shall be safe and secure fire-proof vaults, in which it shall be the duty of the Comptroller to deposit and safely keep all the plates not necessarily in the possession of engravers or printers, and other valuable things belonging to his department, &c.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

Page 5, line eight, after the word "particular" insert the words "county and;" so that the clause will read:

Second. The place where its operations of discount and deposit are to be carried on, designating the State, Territory, or district, and also the particular county and city, town, or village.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

Page 5, line twenty, insert "such certificate with."

The amendment was concurred in.

Sixth amendment:

Same page and clause, line twenty-one, after the word "notary" strike out "and."

The amendment was concurred in.

The clause, as above amended, reads as follows:

The said certificate shall be acknowledged before a judge of some court of record or a notary public, and such certificate with the acknowledgment thereof authenticated by the seal of such court or notary shall be transmitted to the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall record and carefully preserve the same in his office.

Seventh amendment:

Page 8, section ten, line six, after the word "State" insert "Territory or district."

The amendment was concurred in.

Eighth amendment:

On same page, same section, line nine, strike out "said State" and insert "the same" in lieu thereof.

The amendment was concurred in.

Ninth amendment:

Same page and section, on line twenty-one, after the word "loan" strike out the words "obtained from."

The amendment was concurred in.

Tenth amendment:

Same page and section, on line twenty-two, strike out the words "owing to the association of which he is a director."

The amendment was concurred in.

The ninth section, as amended, reads:

SEC. 9. And he it further enacted, That the affairs of every association shall be managed by not less than five directors, one of whom shall be the president. Every director shall, during his whole term of service, be a citizen of the United States; and at least three fourths of the directors shall have resided in the State, Territory, or district in which such association is located one year next preceding their election as directors, and be residents of the same during their continuance in office. Each director shall own, in his own right, at least ten shares of the capital stock of the association of which he is a director. Each director, when appointed or elected, shall take an oath that he will, so far as the duty devolves on him, diligently and honestly administer the affairs of such association, and will not knowingly violate, or willingly permit to be violated, any of the provisions of this act, and that he is the bona fide owner, in his own right, of the number of shares of stock required by this act, subscribed by him, or standing in his name on the books of the association, and that the same is not hypothecated, or in any way pledged as security for any loan or debt; which oath, subscribed by himself, and certified by the officer before whom it is taken, shall be immediately transmitted to the Comptroller of the Currency, and by him filed and preserved in his office.

Eleventh amendment:

Provided, That if the directors fail, to fix the day, as aforesaid, shareholders representing two thirds of the shares may.

The amendment was concurred in.

Twelfth amendment:

Page 10, section twelve, beginning on line nineteen, strike out "except that the shareholders of any banking association having not less than $5,000,000 actually paid in as its capital stock shall be liable as aforesaid only to the amount invested in their share," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Except that shareholders of any banking association now existing under State laws, having not less than $5,000,000 of capital actually paid in, and a surplus of twenty per cent. on hand, both to be determined by the Comptroller of the Currency, shall be liable only to the amount invested in their shares; and such surplus of twenty per cent. shall be kept undiminished, and be in addition to the surplus provided for in this act; and if at any time there shall be a deficiency in said surplus of twenty per cent. the said banking association shall not pay any dividends to its shareholders until such deficiency shall be made good; and in case of such deficiency the Comptroller of the Currency may compel said banking association to close its business and wind up its affairs under the provisions of this act.

The question was put on concurring in the amendments; and there were—ayes 59, noes 17; no quorum voting.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move to strike out that part of the amendment which exempts the stockholders of these large banks from personal liability.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Tellers were ordered on the amendment of the Senate; and Messrs. BAXTER, and STEELE of New Jersey, were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 24.

So the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

While the House was dividing on the above vote,

Mr. BROOKS rose to a point of order.

The SPEAKER declined to entertain a point of order while the House was dividing.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. BROOKS said: I rose merely to say that I am opposed both to the provision of the House bill and to the amendment of the Senate, but the amendment of the Senate makes the House bill a little better. I desired to know how I was to vote when I was opposed to both.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York will follow the counsel of the Chair the Chair will answer his question with great pleasure. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. That will depend on what the decision of the Chair is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot give a decision on such a question unless it is to be followed. [Laughter.]

Thirteenth amendment:

Page 12, section thirteen, after the word "currency," on line seven, strike out the words "and no increase of the capital beyond the maximum so determined shall thereafter be made without the consent of the Comptroller;" so that the section will read:

The amendment was concurred in.

Fifteenth amendment:

Same page and section, add at the end of the above proviso the words "nor from taking up the bonds upon which no circulating notes have been delivered."

Mr. HOOPER. Would it be in order to move an amendment to that amendment?

No assignment or transfer of any such bonds by the Treasurer shall be deemed valid or of binding force and effect unless countersigned by the Comptroller of the Currency. It shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to keep in his office a book in which shall be entered the name of every association from whose accounts such transfer of bonds is made by the Treasurer, and the name of the party to whom such transfer is made; and the par value of the bonds so transferred shall be entered therein; and it shall be the duty of the Comptroller, immediately upon countersigning and entering the same, to advise by mail the association from whose account such transfer was made of the kind and numerical designation of the bonds and the amount thereof so transferred.

States. Of late years, owing to the organization of banks in the States west of this, their circulation has been more limited; but they continue to command general confidence, and are held by many persons as a very reliable security. It must be obvious that it will be a very difficult and a very slow process to withdraw from the hands of the public notes which have been so long in circulation over so extensive a district of country, particularly after a reduction has already been made of well-nigh thirty-three per cent., that is, from $8,000,000 in 1862 to $5,500,000 in 1864. To impose a heavy tax upon this five and a half million of notes, so extensively diffused, and consequently so difficult to get in, will cause it to operate simply as a penalty for not doing that which it is impossible to do.

The bill pending is, therefore, unjust and oppressive, inasmuch as it not only imposes a heavy penalty for doing what was lawful to be done, but that which the parties on whom the penalty is inflicted have not the power to abate otherwise than through the slow operation of regular business transactions.

Your petitioner, therefore, prays your honorable bodies, if it is deemed expedient and proper to impose a penalty on the issue of bank notes with a view of expelling them from circulation, to so modify the pending bill as that it may operate only on such issues made subsequent to its passage, or may be so graduated as to past issues as to allow a reasonable time for their withdrawal.

All which is respectfully submitted.

J. ANDREWS,

President Board of Control of the State Bank of Ohio.
COLUMBUS, OHIO, May 19, 1864.

Thirty-eighth amendment:

That each association organized in any of the cities named in the foregoing section shall select, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, an association in the city of New York at which it will redeem its circulating notes, at a rate of exchange for all cities west of the Alleghany mountains not exceeding one quarter of one per cent., and for all cities east of the Alleghany mountains at par. And each of such associations may keep three fifths of its lawful money reserve in cash deposits in the city of New York. And each association not organized within the cities named in the preceding section shall select, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, an association in either of the cities named in the preceding section at which it will redeem its circulating notes at par.

And in lieu of all existing taxes, every association shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States, in the months of January and July, a duty of one half of one per cent. each half year from and after the 1st day of January, 1864, upon the average amount of its notes in circulation, and a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year upon the average amount of its deposits, and a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year, as aforesaid, on the average amount of its capital stock beyond the amount invested in United States bonds; and in case of default in the payment thereof by any association, the duties aforesaid may be collected in the manner provided for the collection of United States duties of other corporations, or the Treasurer may reserve the amount of said duties out of the interest, as it may become due, on the bonds deposited with him by such defaulting association. And it shall be the duty of each association, within ten days from the 1st days of January and July of each year, to make a return, under the oath of its president or cashier, to the Treasurer of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, of the average amount of its notes in circulation, and of the average amount of its deposits, and of the average amount of its capital stock, beyond the amount invested in United States bonds, for the six months next preceding said 1st days of January and July as aforesaid, and in default of such return, and for each default thereof, each defaulting association shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of $200, to be collected either out of the interest as it may become due such association on the bonds deposited with the Treasurer, or, at his option, in the manner in which penalties are to be collected of other corporations under the laws of the United States; and in case of such default the amount of the duties to be paid by such association shall be assessed upon the amount of notes delivered to such association by the Comptroller of the Currency, and upon the highest amount of its deposits and capital stock, to be ascertained in such other manner as the Treasurer may deem best: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the market value of the shares in any of the said associations, held by any person or body corporate, from being included in the valuation of the personal property of such person or corporation in the assessment of all taxes imposed by or under State authority, for State, county, or municipal purposes, but not at greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State: And all the remedies provided by State laws for the collection of such taxes shall be applicable thereto: Provided further, That no tax shall be imposed under the laws of any State upon the shares in any of the associations authorized by this act at a rate exceeding that imposed upon the shares in banks organized under authority of the State where such association is located: Provided, also, That nothing in this act shall exempt the real estate of associations from either State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real estate is taxed.

And thereupon the Comptroller shall immediately give notice, in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury shall, by general rules or otherwise direct, to the holders of the circulating notes of such association, to present them for payment at the Treasury of the United States, and the same shall be paid as presented in lawful money of the United States; whereupon said Comptroller may, in his discretion, cancel an amount of bonds pledged by such association equal to current market rates, not exceeding par, to the notes paid. And it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, to make such regulations respecting the disposition to be made of such circulating notes after presentation thereof for payment as aforesaid, and respecting the perpetuation of the evidence of the payment thereof, as may seem to him proper; but all such notes, on being paid, shall be canceled. And for any deficiency in the proceeds of the bonds pledged by such association, when disposed of as hereinafter specified, to reimburse to the United States the amount so expended in paying the circulating notes of such association, the United States shall have a first and paramount lien upon all the assets of such association; and such deficiency shall be made good out of such assets in preference to any and all other claims whatsoever except the necessary costs and expenses of administering the same.

Such violation shall, however, be determined and adjudged by a proper circuit, district, or territorial court of the United States, in a suit brought for that purpose by the Comptroller of the Currency, in his own name, before the association shall be declared dissolved. And in cases of such violation, every director who participated in or assented to the same shall be held liable in his personal and individual capacity for all damages which the association, its shareholders, or any other person, shall have sustained in consequence of such violation.

Second. A statement of the associations whose business has been closed during the year, with the amount of their circulation redeemed and the amount outstanding.

Third. Any amendment to the laws relative to banking by which the system may be improved and the security of the holders of its notes and other creditors may be increased.

Fourth. The names and compensation of the clerks employed by him, and the whole amount of the expenses of the banking department during the year. And such report shall be made by or before the 1st day of December in each year, and the usual number of copies for the use of the Senate and House, and one thousand copies for the use of the Department, shall be printed by the Public Printer, and in readiness for distribution at the first meeting of Congress.

The amendments were severally concurred in.

Mr. HOOPER moved to reconsider the vote by which the several amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER moved that there be a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the report of the Committee on Commerce in regard to the reciprocity treaty, on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that this joint resolution be taken out of the morning hour and made the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. MORRILL. I think that there will be no objection to disposing of it at once, without making it a special order.

The SPEAKER. There are seven or more speeches to be made on the subject.

Mr. SLOAN. I object.

NEWSBOYS' HOME.

Mr. PATTERSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate a newsboys' home; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BROOKS. What is the use of incorporating a home for boys who circulate newspapers, if newspapers can be summarily suppressed by executive power?

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman's foreboding be true, then the more necessity for this home.

Mr. COX. We do not know that newspapers may not be suppressed in this country pretty soon, that Fremont and other papers will be suppressed, and these boys will want a home, and I am not surprised the benevolent gentleman from New York makes objection.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question. I would like to know of him whether the Government is not furnishing homes to editors.

Mr. BROOKS. I am not able to answer that question. Gentlemen upon the other side can answer that question better than I can.

Mr. KERNAN. As this question has been started, and coming from a State where the people have been very greatly aggrieved recently by one of those spasmodic efforts of energy which has trampled down the Constitution and the rights of some of its citizens there, I desire to make a few remarks upon that subject.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I rise to a point of order. I believe the previous question was moved by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PATTERSON.]

The SPEAKER. That is true; but the previous question was moved while the gentleman from New York was upon the floor, and was not, therefore, in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a point of order. Here is a bill merely for incorporating a newsboys' home, in order to enable the owner of the building to get an insurance on it. Now, the gentleman from New York proposes to discuss the matter of the suppression of the World and the Journal of Commerce, and I submit that such discussion is not in order upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to say that the gentleman raised a point of order on what I proposed to state. Now, I desire to state what I proposed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can go on, and the Chair will arrest him when he departs from the course of debate allowed under the rule.

Mr. COX. If I understand the ruling of the Chair, I appeal. I desire to know what the ruling of the Chair is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state his decision.

Mr. KERNAN. I will not struggle with the Chair or with the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio appeals from the decision of the Chair, and that question must be first decided. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] rose to a question of order, stating that the remarks of the gentleman from New York in regard to the suppression of the World and Journal of Commerce in the city of New York are not in order upon a bill for the incorporation of a newsboys' home in the District of Columbia. The Chair sustained the point of order, as the bill is a bill incorporating a newsboys' home in this city, and thinks debate must be confined to that question. From that decision the gentleman from Ohio appeals.

Mr. COX. I will withdraw the appeal, for I do not understand that the gentleman from New York has said a word in regard to the World. Somebody's conscience has pricked him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York can proceed in order.

Mr. KERNAN. It is not my intention to, nor will I ever, make any struggle to get in remarks which I desire to make against any rule or decision of the Chair; but I do desire to oppose this bill, if I may be permitted to give my reasons, namely: that it is idle for us here to be passing laws to protect newsboys or to protect any one else, if we will not see to it that the laws and the Constitution, which are intended to protect citizens, are not trampled down; [hear! hear!] and if I may be permitted to do so I desire to state why this House, the council of the nation, the only grand inquest to which the people look, should see that the laws are enforced and the rights of the people preserved. I intend, in respectful terms and in no partisan spirit, to call the attention of this House to the importance of adding to this bill an express provision that the press shall not be suppressed nor citizens arrested or imprisoned at the dictation and arbitrary will of any executive officer.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a point of order. It is that the freedom of speech is not the subject-matter of this bill, and therefore it is out of order to discuss that question upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and he will say to the gentleman from New York that the speech which he signifies his desire to make would certainly be quite as appropriate upon a bill granting a pension, or upon a bill making a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad, as upon this bill. The debate must be confined to the subject-matter of the bill, and that is whether a newsboys' home shall be incorporated.

Mr. KERNAN. I do desire to say to the House that I feel deeply impressed with the importance, for the well-being of the country, of our so acting in reference to this subject that the people shall not be tempted to disorders of any kind. I do not desire to use intemperate language, but I wish to call the attention of the House, in emphatic language, to the importance of seeing that no executive officer shall, from mistake or impulse, or any other motive, do an act the tendency of which is to alienate the people from sustaining those in authority, and the tendency of which is to weaken the legitimate authority of the Government.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman from New York will not be allowed to go on any further.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent. Is there any objection to the gentleman from New York making the speech which he has indicated?

Mr. STEVENS. I object to his making it now. If the gentleman desires, I will move that an evening be set apart for hearing it.

Mr. KERNAN. I will be very happy to speak on the subject at any time.

Mr. STEVENS. I am willing to give the gentleman an evening.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order.

The SPEAKER. On what ground?

Mr. COX. The Chair ruled the gentleman from New York out of order.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope these interlocutory remarks will not come out of my time.

Mr. COX. As a friend of the Chair, I would like to suggest one point before he overrules the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about deciding the point of order just made by the gentleman from Ohio himself. He made the point that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] was not in order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] proceeding now, but suggests that he will be willing to give him some evening; whereupon the gentleman from Ohio calls him to order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MALLORY. I rise to a point of order. My question of order is this, that no member had a right to arrest the gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] in his remarks, as he was arrested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS], because the Speaker had distinctly stated that the gentleman from New York was in order if he intended to pursue the line of argument that inasmuch as all the laws intended to secure our personal rights were being stricken down by the arbitrary exercise of power by the Executive, it was useless to discuss in this House the propriety of erecting a house of refuge for newsboys or any other destitute class of persons. The Chair had made that decision, and after he had stated that the gentleman from New York would be in order in that line of argument, the gentleman from Pennsylvania rose and objected to the gentleman from New York proceeding. My point of order is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had no right to make such an objection when the Chair had decided that the gentleman from New York had a right to proceed in that line of argument.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky would be correct in his point of order if he were correct in his premises; but the fact happens to be exactly the reverse. The Chair decided exactly the reverse of what the gentleman from Kentucky understood him to decide. He decided that the gentleman from New York was not in order, because the argument he was making was that because, as he assumed, laws had been stricken down, there was no use in passing any laws. The Chair said that if that speech was in order on this bill it would be just as much in order on a pension bill or a land-grant bill, or any other bill. The gentleman from New York then proceeded and stated that he would not endeavor to speak in opposition to the intimation of the Chair, but that he would like to have unanimous consent to make his remarks; and he gave as a reason that his motive was the preservation of the public peace; whereupon the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] rose to object.

Mr. MALLORY. Then I misunderstood the Chair. I understood him to say that the gentleman's argument would be in order on any bill; on this bill as well as on a pension or land-grant bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated very distinctly that the gentleman's remarks were out of order, because if they were in order such a line of debate would be in order on any bill. The Chair spoke of a pension bill or a land-grant bill in order that the whole House might see the irrelevancy of the gentleman's remarks to the bill now pending.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to offer an amendment as an additional section to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Amendments at this stage are not in order. The bill has passed the third reading, and the question now is, shall it pass?

Mr. BROOKS. Would it be in order to move a reconsideration?

The SPEAKER. It would be.

Mr. BROOKS. Would that bring up the merits of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It would, but the merits of this bill only.

Mr. BROOKS. It would leave no more latitude for discussion?

The SPEAKER. No wider latitude than the bill itself.

Mr. BROOKS. I move, then, to recommit the bill to the Committee for the District of Columbia, with instructions to add the following as an additional section:

The provisions of this bill shall apply to the city of New York, and the persons herein named shall have power to organize and manage a home for newsboys in said city: Provided, It shall not be lawful for the Executive of the United States, or any officer acting under his authority, to suppress newspapers in said city by military force, thus depriving said newsboys of their employment.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides, without the point of order being made, that the amendment is palpably out of order.

Mr. BROOKS. My proposition is that the bill be recommitted to the Committee for the District of Columbia, with instructions to report that as an additional section.

The SPEAKER. The committee cannot be instructed to do what the House itself cannot do. An amendment with reference to the city of New York is not in order. The gentleman from New York of course understands that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I rise to a question of order. The House decided lately that Congress had power to charter railroads in New Jersey, and I do not see why it cannot charter a newsboys' home in the city of New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The decision of the House on the New Jersey railroad bill has nothing to do with this case.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to recommit the bill with instructions to report an additional section that no newsboy in the city of Washington shall be arrested or editor incarcerated without due process of law.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides the motion out of order, on the ground that it has nothing to do with the propriety of the incorporation of a newsboys' home.

Mr. COX. Has the Chair read the Constitution of the United States on that subject? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has read it very often, [laughter,] and he has also often sworn to support it.

Mr. FENTON. I move the previous question on the bill.

Mr. KERNAN. I have not yielded the floor for that purpose.

Mr. BROOKS. I have not demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] gave up the floor and took his seat, as the Chair understood.

Mr. BROOKS. I beg pardon of the Chair. The Chair misunderstood me. I have taken particular care not to sit down since this discussion commenced, knowing how sharp gentlemen on the other side of the House are.

Mr. FENTON. The Chair decided the motion of the gentleman to be out of order. The gentleman then commenced writing at his desk without intimating what his purpose was.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from New York surrendered the floor.

Mr. BROOKS. I have not surrendered the floor.

Mr. COX. I raise the point of order that the ruling of the Chair always is that the word of a member in all these cases must be taken.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from Ohio can find a case where the Chair has refused to take the word of a member it will be time for him to make the point of order.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] states that he did not sit down.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair decides that the gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me.

Mr. FENTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can yield in explanation of this measure, according to the decision on page 72 of Barclay's Digest.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Do I understand the Chair to decide that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is still entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York states that he did not resume his seat, and according to his general usage the Chair accepts what the gentleman has stated, although he seemed to have taken his seat.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I raise the point of order that the Chair and the House cannot be trifled with by a gentleman rising and sitting, and rising and sitting, and experimenting with amendments from time to time, getting the decisions of the Chair against them, and then commencing to write others.

Mr. BROOKS. That is no point of order. I am not trifling with the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is nothing else.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman from New York has the right to the floor for an hour.

Mr. BROOKS. I yield to my colleague, [Mr. KERNAN.]

Mr. MORRILL. Does the gentleman from New York yield unconditionally?

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I object to his yielding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to yield according to the rule which says that when a member is occupying the floor he may yield it to another for explanation of the pending measure as well as for personal explanation. The gentleman yields to his colleague for explanation of the pending measure—the incorporation of a newsboys' home—but the remarks of the gentleman must be confined to that matter.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to urge upon the House that in view of recent events it is important that this home should be incorporated, and made a very extensive institution. If it be true that any executive officer can in a moment arrest the circulation of a paper of large circulation—

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the gentleman is not confining himself, in the remarks he is making, to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the question of order, and states to the gentleman from New York that he cannot, with the consent of the Chair, do by indirection what the House and the Chair have decided he cannot do directly.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Chair allow me a suggestion, in good faith, for I do not wish to trouble him or the House out of order? I did suppose that I might legitimately argue, from recent events, that it was important to have a newsboys' home established, for the reason that they were liable at any moment to be thrown out of employment. That was the line of argument I was pursuing, and I was applying to it facts of recent occurrence.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has heard the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, but still decides his remarks to be out of order, upon the same ground. The gentleman might discuss the whole policy of the war upon this bill if the remarks he now makes are in order.

Mr. KERNAN. I did not desire to discuss the questions of the war, but the uncertainty at this time of the business of selling newspapers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the remarks of the gentleman are not in order.

Mr. BROOKS. I am decidedly in favor of this bill, and hope it will be passed. I know of no period of time so well adapted for the establishment of a newsboys' home as the present period, and of no place more appropriate than this city of Washington. It always has been necessary, and now more than ever is it indispensably necessary for the welfare and safety of the country, and above all for the journalism of the country. It is your pride, Mr. Speaker, it is my pride that in our earlier years we have been newsboys, raised in newspaper offices, and are journalists. And it is highly desirable that if any misfortune should overtake us either by poverty, disease, or by any arbitrary exercise of Federal power, that a home be prepared for us to be sanctioned and sustained by the Federal Government, and under the command of officers high in authority.

Mr. NELSON. I think some of the newspaper men have been assigned to Fort La Fayette as a home; I wish to ask the gentleman from New York if he is in favor of the maintenance of that as a home?

Mr. BROOKS. This is a bill for the establishment of a home for newsboys in the city of Washington, and I am in favor of establishing it in the building now known as the Old Capitol prison. I desire to see that building well prepared and decorated for their entertainment and comfort when the high hand of Federal authority shall be laid upon them. I ask for the erection of a newsboys' home, and I desire that it may be in a situation that will lead them to the thorough study and comprehension of the great principles of human liberty. I would have them read and reread the Magna Charta not only in the translation, but in the original Latin. I would have them educated and thoroughly trained in all the principles in which that great charter was extorted by the Barons at Runnymede from King John. I would especially have impressed upon them that great principle—nullus liber homo capitur, vel imprisonetur, aut desseisiatur de libero tenemento, &c.—no freeman shall be seized or imprisoned but by due process of law. I would have it placarded upon the walls of that Capitol prison to be read and reread in English, in Latin, in German, in Spanish, and in all modern languages, so that it may be thoroughly understood by every newsboy who went to that home. I would have the newsboys educated in that school where they should read and reread the whole history of England, that the facts may be brought home to them that were brought home to our fathers, who made the Constitution of the United States, and provided that no man should be arrested without due process of law. I would have brought home to them the fact that there is nothing original in that Constitution which had not already existed in the common law of England for three or five hundred years before it was ingrafted in the Federal Constitution. I would have these newsboys so thoroughly trained in these great principles that when they stepped from selling newspapers to the position of journalist and saw the attempt made to strike down the liberty of the press they should rise up in their might and vindicate these great doctrines. Is that out of order? [A voice on the Democratic side, ironically, "It's slightly treasonable, I am afraid."]

Mr. BROOKS. Treasonable! Sir, they who commit treason against the United States are they who violate these great principles. They who commit treason against the Constitution are they who imprison newsboys, or journalists, or any other class of persons in any sort of home, against the guarantees of the Constitution. Treason against the Constitution is a violation of the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must arrest the remarks of the gentleman from New York, as they are not in order.

Mr. BROOKS. If this is not in order, then I may as well sit down.

Mr. PATTERSON. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. PATTERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECIPROCITY TREATY—AGAIN.

Mr. FENTON. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SLOAN,] to withdraw his objection to making the joint resolution in regard to the reciprocity treaty the special order for tomorrow after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. SLOAN. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. STEVENS. Does not this come up in the morning hour?

Mr. FENTON. It does; and my proposition is that it be made the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope not. I hope that it will be discussed in the morning hour. There is much other business that ought to be attended to.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen have desired to see resumed the call of committees, which has been suspended for nearly three months. There are other bills in the morning hour besides this one which must be got out of the way before that call can be continued.

Mr. STEVENS. That result can only be accomplished by our voting instead of talking, and I am opposed to letting this thing run beyond another morning hour. I wanted to speak on it myself; I would speak on it with great pleasure, but I am willing to forego that great pleasure, and let the vote be taken without saying another word.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest that it be the unanimous consent of the House to take the vote on the joint resolution to-morrow at three o'clock, p. m.

Mr. STEVENS. I shall not object to that.

Mr. WARD. I think that we can close the discussion of the joint resolution to-morrow. The gentlemen who are to speak will do so briefly, and it is probable that the vote can be taken at the time indicated. It will at least expedite the business of the House to make the pending joint resolution the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. PRICE. Let us have night sessions for this discussion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the joint resolution being made a special order for to-morrow, after the morning hour?

Mr. RADFORD. I object.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the effort which has been kindly made by my friend and colleague, the honorable member from New York, [Mr. FENTON,] to postpone the consideration of the joint resolution before the House until to-morrow, by reason of my indisposition to-day, seems to occasion some embarrassment, I will now proceed with the remarks which I purpose to submit. I confess, however, that my physical condition is such that I ought not to make the exertion necessary to render my voice audible in this Hall.

I did not intend to address to the House any remarks on this subject until a very recent period, for I hoped that my colleague, the honorable member from the twenty-second district of New York, [Mr. LITTLEJOHN,] who, from an intimate experience of thirty years in the commerce of the North and of the lakes, is eminently qualified to discuss all the questions involved in the reciprocity treaty, would be able to present to the House his own enlightened views, which would be far more worthy of consideration than mine. But illness which now disables me has for the whole session prostrated him, and I therefore feel compelled to say something in behalf of his constituency and my own.

The existing treaty with Great Britain, in reference to reciprocal traffic and commerce between the British provinces of North America and the United States, is about to terminate, provided either Government shall give the notice authorized by its terms. It is evident that the people of the United States are to a considerable extent dissatisfied with its operation, and a resolution is now introduced authorizing the notice to be given which by the terms of the treaty will, as now claimed, accomplish its abrogation.

In looking at the treaty in reference to the legal effect of its provisions, I do not believe that the time has yet arrived when the notice to abrogate it can be given.

The following is the language, so far as necessary to quote it, of the fifth article of the treaty:

"The present treaty shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and by the provincial Parliaments of those of the North American colonies which are affected by this treaty, on the one hand, and by the Congress of the United States on the other. Such assent having been given, the treaty shall remain in force from the date at which it may come into operation, and further until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same."

This treaty, although signed by the contracting parties in June, 1854, did not become a law until the respective Legislatures of Parliaments of the provinces and of England and the Congress of the United States had passed the several acts necessary to give it validity. This legislation was not effected until the month of September, 1854, when the commercial season of that year had almost expired.

Therefore, practically, it did not go into effect upon commerce until 1855, and ten years have not yet elapsed since it in any legal sense went into operation, nor indeed since the execution of the treaty itself.

Before the expiration of ten years in its operation, and on the first Monday of December next, Congress again convenes; the legal term will then be fully passed, and we may, if we then deem it expedient, direct the notice of abrogation to be given. It seems to me that under the terms of the treaty, and without reference to any other consideration, it would be discreet to postpone any action upon the subject until the next session.

I know it will be replied, on the other hand, that by virtue of legislation in Congress, in England, and the provinces, affecting the operation of the treaty, and subsequent to its date, it virtually took effect in June, 1854, because this legislation provided that all duties paid by either party upon the importation of goods made free by treaty provision should be refunded, and that all bonds given for the payment of duties after the date of the treaty should be canceled. But I say that according to legal construction it did not, it could not, become legally effective until after every act of legislation required by the terms and language of the treaty was passed by each of the parties to be affected by it.

And I cannot illustrate my view of this point better than by proposing to the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] who made allusion to it the other day, the question whether a party on the 1st day of August, 1854, importing produce from the provinces into the United States, subject to duty under the laws in operation before the date of the treaty, would be protected by anything in this treaty from the payment of the duty. The former laws were not repealed until the treaty became valid by the legislation which was a condition precedent to its operation. That legislation might or might not be adopted; all was contingent and uncertain; and until the fact of the legal acceptance of the terms by all the parties, the treaty did not begin to exist, and its term did not begin to run. The subsequent legislation giving it a retrospective effect was no part of the treaty, and the time thus covered no part of the ten years specified.

But independently of any legal consideration of this nature, let us inquire whether it would be consistent with sound judgment, and with a statesmanlike and comprehensive view of our internal affairs and our foreign relations, to give notice of our determination to abrogate this treaty. The giving of any notice at this time is, in my judgment, on political grounds, a matter of very doubtful policy, and it seems to me clear that the imperative terms of the resolution are specially unnecessary and unadvisable.

The honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] who advocated the positive and mandatory terms of the resolution, told us that he did not feel willing to take any step or to employ any language which might be regarded as bowing down to Great Britain and soliciting terms of her.

I do not wish to humble my country before that Power or any other on the globe, and I have no fear, not the slightest, that, occupying to-day the position of one of the greatest military Powers of the earth, with a Navy more formidable than any of which England ever boasted, with armies in the field superior in numbers and appointment to that which carried the eagles of Napoleon to Vienna or to Moscow, our dignity or our honor is to be impeached by a frank and honest intimation to Great Britain of our desire not to abrogate or annul the treaty, but to modify and amend it, so as to make it mutually just and beneficial. I would not hesitate to give the notice because of the greatness or power of Britain, but because I believe it unnecessary and demanded neither by justice nor policy nor interest.

Sir, the great system of commercial communication between these States and the provinces, provided by nature and improved by art, unrivaled as it is in any country of the globe, in itself suggests the idea and propriety of intimate commercial relations. The provinces and the States lie side by side, stretching from ocean to ocean across a continent, with a common highway and boundary of lakes and rivers, extending for more than two thousand miles between.

In addition to this, we within our own limits have provided artificial channels from Erie and Ontario to the tide-waters of the Hudson, as more convenient, direct, and economical avenues for the commerce of the West than the one which nature constructed in the valley of the St. Lawrence.

I cannot forget in the consideration of this subject that the great object of the American people and of the State of New York, in the creation of these artificial highways, has been the benefit of commerce, and progress in the development of our natural and exhaustless resources.

Sir, there are many physical facts and considerations connected with this subject which are worthy of remembrance.

The projectors of our system of internal improvements naturally asked what was to be the nature of their business and what the sources whence it should be derived.

From the first exploration of the northwestern States, and of the vast region lying beyond and outside of the lines of general settlement and cultivation, it has been known that within our own jurisdiction we possessed a vast area of territory well adapted to the culture of wheat, corn, and other valuable grains, and that north of the lakes, extending from the St. Lawrence to the sources of the Mississippi and beyond, within the lines of British jurisdiction, another vast field existed, where soil and climate indicated an extensive cereal production. Indeed, throughout a very considerable portion of eastern Canada, even, it is known that wheat can be successfully cultivated; and although we regard it in common parlance as a cold and cheerless region, a reference to the map will teach us that if we extend our own northwestern boundary, the forty-ninth parallel, easterly till we strike the St. Lawrence, and thence by a right line to the northern limit of Maine, a little north of the forty-seventh parallel, we shall find south of that line, in what is now British territory, a territory of nearly four hundred thousand square miles, in a large portion of which, especially at the west, wheat is the most extensive and profitable agricultural production.

Now, sir, if we add to this region the area lying between the longitude and latitude of Lake Superior and the Rocky mountains, a territory of far greater extent and adapted by peculiar physical conditions to the culture of wheat and other cereals, we shall discover that we have room enough in British territory for an unlimited production and an inexhaustible commerce. I will not here enlarge upon the physical facts which make this region specially favorable to agricultural production. It is for the present enough to know that the British Territories of the Northwest are destined to become most important contributors of agricultural production to the marts of our eastern shores.

The only outlets by water to the Atlantic afforded to this production and to the production of the western and northwestern States are by the Ohio or other western streams, and the Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico; or by the lakes and the St. Lawrence to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, or by the lakes and the New York canals to the Hudson and New York. There are important reasons why the produce of all our northwestern States and of the British territories north of them should seek our Atlantic ports rather than New Orleans or the St. Lawrence.

Is it not, then, our policy to keep open all our communications and relations with our British neighbors with the view of retaining the commerce and controlling the production which were distinctly in the view of those who laid the basis of our internal communications? Commercial interest dictated the treaty of reciprocity, and although we may have been disappointed in some regards as to its workings, we have by its means secured a large interest in the commerce it was intended to reach. Commerce unrestricted will naturally seek those channels which secure, in the greatest degree practicable, directness, safety, economy. Water communication within the limits of the facilities it affords is, for considerable distances, cheaper than any other mode of transportation, and therefore will be sought in preference to other transportation to the same point. Our lakes and canals furnish a more direct and safer transit of property to and from the West and Northwest than can be found by the St. Lawrence, the navigation of which at its entrance into the Gulf is closed for more than half the year, and made dangerous by fogs and storms for the residue. The Mississippi route is less favorable than ours, both on account of increased distance, cost, and safety. It was therefore that the line of water communication was made between the lakes and the Hudson, affording an uninterrupted, cheap, and convenient channel for commerce, in a favorable climate, and connecting with the most ample and safest seaport on the Atlantic coast. Moreover, it is on the only line within our national jurisdiction, from the Bay of Fundy to the Gulf of Mexico, where a water or canal communication could be constructed from the Atlantic to the lakes or the Mississippi.

If we trace the physical outlines even of Lower Canada we find the Laurentian mountain chain extends from the northerly and westerly shores of the Gulf of St. Lawrence southwesterly between the head-waters of the Ottawa river and Lake Huron. The Appalachian range lifts its forbidding outlines from central New York to Alabama and Georgia, leaving but one gateway through which commerce may pass untaxed for artificial aid, and through that gateway the unrivaled Hudson rolls its flood. For these reasons the New York canals possess the most practicable and safe and economical communication for the British provinces of the Northwest to the seaboard. I may perhaps properly add in this connection that British productions, as well as our own in the West and Northwest, will be permanently, to a great extent, excluded from the Mississippi channel of exportation by reason of high temperature not only of the lower Mississippi but of the waters of the Gulf through or over which these productions are exported. Wheat in bulk, corn, oats, and other grains are often destroyed by heat and vapor on their southern passage. Flour itself is injured, and sometimes made worthless, while through our own channels injuries seldom result from these causes. With the exception of a few months during the present war the Mississippi has been open for commerce since the purchase of Louisiana, yet I think it will appear by authentic reports which I have examined that not one bushel of grain in fifty of that exported to Europe has been shipped from New Orleans.

The purposes of the treaty of 1854 were to afford mutual benefits to all by the establishment of intimate permanent commercial relations between them, and to promote the importation and exportation of the productions of the several countries for their mutual convenience.

In addition to the traffic we expected to secure in Canadian grains, we anticipated the importation of lumber, especially of pine, both from Canada and from New Brunswick, in exchange for produce we might sell to them. Lumber is one of the principal, perhaps the principal of the products of Canada, while with us the production each year is becoming less, from the clearing up of accessible lands. The lumber of the pine region of Canada between the St. Lawrence and Lake Huron is inexhaustible for a century. The production of this lumber affords employment to the Canadian laborer, profit to his employer, freight to the carrier, and from the arrival of lumber at our own ports it becomes a source of public and private profit to us. It pays freight to our boatmen, tolls to our canals, commissions to our merchants, premiums to our insurers, and taxes to our Government.

All Upper Canada as well as Lower Canada is destitute of fossil coal, and it is furnished by Ohio and Pennsylvania, and perhaps a little by Michigan, in payment of imports. The annual consumption of American coal in Canada West and East will not probably fall far short of four hundred thousand tons. From its mining to its delivery on Canadian wharves it is a source of profit to our people.

We thus supply the Canadas of the West with fuel adapted to their uses, and cheaper than any other to be obtained, all which we can spare from our infinite abundance.

Now, on the other hand, in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick nature has stored immense deposits of coal, in which our eastern States are deficient, and thus we receive from the eastern provinces, for New England at least, what Pennsylvania and Ohio furnish to the western provinces. Thus the trade becomes mutually advantageous; and I cannot see why in that regard we should be willing to put a stop to it.

I am not here, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of saying that this treaty with Great Britain has produced all the good effects anticipated by us. I am aware that its operation has been in many respects what we did not anticipate, and what we had no right to anticipate. Effects have resulted, not from the treaty, but from subsequent legislation of the Canadian provinces, which we now attribute to the treaty itself. When that treaty was entered into it was, doubtless, with the understanding on both sides that the legislation of the provinces and of the States would be such as to favor the terms and spirit of the treaty. And yet we found that after 1855, and from time to time up to 1859 the provincial legislatures imposed discriminating duties in favor of Canada and against us, as will appear by the following schedule:

Articles.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
Molasses.....	16	11	11	18	30

The idea of selling our manufactured goods to Canada was one of the inducements on our side to enter into the treaty. We have therefore, perhaps, a right to complain of the violation of the spirit of the treaty; though, from an examination which I have given to the treaty itself, I do not find that this subsequent legislation is any technical violation of its terms.

On the other hand, I might refer to what the Canadian authorities say in regard to American legislation. They admit that they have legislated in a way which discriminates in favor of their own productions, and they place it on the ground of political and financial necessity. They say that the expenditures in which they have become involved, or for which they have incurred obligations for the purpose of developing the interests of Canada, have rendered it absolutely essential that they should impose duties beyond what they had anticipated in order to meet the interest on their public debt.

Now, sir, I apprehend that it will not be necessary for us to go far back to find that we have been in that same condition, and they, therefore, with as much justice reply to us that we have imposed duties discriminating against the interests of Canada. And it is so. The facts and statistics, the details of which I have not time now to present, will prove that proposition. It is a matter that is distinctly set forth in the communication of the finance minister of Canada in his report to his Government in 1862.

I have heard it stated upon this floor that the operation of this treaty was entirely against American interests and American commerce. I say, sir, that the report made by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, showing the entire operations of this treaty from 1854 to 1862, proves that the commerce between the two countries has been constantly increasing, although less since 1859 than before that time. Still there has been a general and constant increase in the extent of that traffic which it was the purpose of that treaty to encourage.

Now, sir, I will say here that it is hardly a fair comparison to date the commencement of the trade under this treaty back to 1854. It substantially went into operation in 1855. It did not legally go into operation until so late in 1854 that the trade under it could not be fairly said to have commenced until 1855. Since that time up to 1862 the following has been the amount of trade between the two countries:

Exports from June, 1855, to June, 1862, of foreign goods.....	$31,603,362
Domestic.....	135,522,179
Apparent total.....	167,125,541
Imports during same period.....	145,183,096
Excess of exports over imports.....	$21,942,445

Mr. ARNOLD. With the permission of the gentleman, I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the joint resolution before the House in order that it may be printed.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the gentleman that his amendment will not be in order as a substitute inasmuch as one substitute is already pending.

Mr. ARNOLD. I will then offer my amendment to the original resolution if that will be in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cobb in the chair.) An amendment will be in order to the original resolution.

Mr. ARNOLD then submitted the following amendment, which was read and ordered to be printed:

Strike out after the word "authorized," in the fourth line of the original resolution, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint three commissioners to confer with persons duly authorized by Great Britain in that behalf, to negotiate a new treaty, based upon the true principles of reciprocity between the two Governments and the people of both countries, with the view of enlarging the basis of the present treaty, and for the removal of existing difficulties," and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

By and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint three commissioners to confer with persons duly authorized by Great Britain in that behalf, to negotiate a new treaty, based upon the true principles of reciprocity between the two Governments and the people of both countries, with the view of enlarging the basis of the present treaty, and for the removal of existing difficulties: Provided, That in case no such treaty shall be agreed to by both Governments, then, in such case, the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to give the notice terminating said treaty according to the provisions thereof.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. These figures show that all this loud talk which we have heard against the unjust and inequitable operations of this treaty has not facts on which it is based, but that, on the contrary, during this period we have exported to Canada $22,000,000 more than we have imported from Canada.

Sir, while I admit that a portion of the imports under that treaty has been free of duty, still I say that it has afforded business support to our own citizens. All that has been sold has been paid for with a profit to ourselves, and all that has been bought and sold has added so much to our business, which, under other circumstances, we might not have had at all.

Now, sir, let us follow this operation for a moment. Suppose we imported of British fabrics or West India productions $25,000,000 a year, which we sent to Canada. Do we not receive on that the ordinary profit of purchase abroad, shipment to New York or other port in the United States? Do we not receive freight on our internal navigation? Do not some of the States receive tolls on their avenues of communication? Thus we find wherever this product may be purchased that it is a source of profit to our own citizens until we part with it.

In a report which I have had occasion to examine on this subject, I find it stated that in one year we actually sent $3,000,000 in gold into Canada to pay the difference between exports and imports. I do not care if it were $10,000,000. Why do we send it there? Simply for the purpose of purchasing produce which we send abroad and thus increase our business. That is not an alarming proposition. In that same year Canada sent to New York nearly twice the amount of gold that we sent to Canada, at least one and a half times as much; and if we pay gold to any extent to Canada, we convert the import into gold again in Europe where we ship our Canadian imports as freights for our own shipping.

But, sir, there are other considerations I desire to present which affect those points in which I have an interest. I might refer to salt. My own district is largely interested in salt. We send, perhaps, three hundred thousand barrels of salt to Canada every year, and we get our pay in their lumber or in articles which they can furnish to us cheaper than we can get them anywhere else. Is there anything wrong in that traffic? I think not; and to take a comprehensive view of the subject it seems to me that we ought to regard Canada as we do Ohio. Whatever Ohio brings to us swells our commerce, and whatever Canada brings to us does the same thing.

But the other reason to which I especially wish to draw attention is this: that the communication by the St. Lawrence with the ocean is one of commercial necessity. Sir, when the State of New York commenced her grand system of internal improvements, uniting the ocean with the great lakes and the valley of the Mississippi, the country lying west of Lake Erie was a desert. Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and almost Ohio were a perfect wilderness. It was with a view of developing that region that De Witt Clinton and those with him proposed a water communication between the Hudson and the lakes. They foresaw that an empire would arise there, and they meant that it should be tributary to the East, to New York and New England, by making the only water communication with it north of the Gulf of Mexico. Sagacious as they were they failed to foresee the rapid growth of this empire. The Erie canal was hardly built before it failed to meet the demands made upon it by western productions for transportation. Now, sir, if I had time I might show by the transportation by that commercial avenue from year to year the growth and expansion of the western States. The Erie canal being incompetent to carry what the West forced upon it, the State of New York, as a matter of State pride and State interest, enlarged it. It spent millions in doing it, but before that enlargement was completed another was called for, and other millions have been expended in responding to the call of the West for additional facilities for transportation. New York has, sir, invested nearly fifty million dollars in the erection of her canal system, now yielding her a fair income and reward. Yet, sir, the Erie canal with its present capacity is entirely insufficient to carry off the products of Illinois and the great West; and within the last two years, affected somewhat by the closing of the Mississippi river in consequence of the war, you have found that it cost the same to send a bushel of wheat or a barrel of flour from the ports on Lake Michigan to New York, whether by way of the lakes and canals, by the Pittsburgh, Chicago, and Fort Wayne, and the Central Pennsylvania roads, by the Dunkirk and Erie road, or by the New York Central and Hudson River roads. It costs the same price for the reason that every channel has been filled to its utmost capacity, and of course the carrier could charge whatever he pleased.

The traffic of the West over the New York canals, the New York Central road, the New York and Erie and the Pennsylvania roads in 1862 amounted to nearly four million tons, consisting of the cereal products grown upon the prairies of Illinois, Minnesota, Iowa, and the northwestern States. I say they are the great producing States of the West, and we have got to look to their interests, for let me tell you the States which were once the favorite regions for cereal grains produce them no longer as before. New York has ceased to be a wheat-growing State, and Ohio to-day produces three or four million bushels less than she did twenty years ago. You have got to look to the Northwest, to this great and rich country, where the climate and soil both unite for producing the best and hardest wheat, which can be taken to market without injury or loss.

In Minnesota, and in all the region of the upper Mississippi, the climate is singularly favorable to the cultivation of grains.

Climate, sir, depends often upon physical considerations, other than latitude: it depends upon elevation, upon the currents of the atmosphere and the currents of the ocean. The mercury falls, as we ascend from the general level of the earth, about one degree Fahrenheit in every three hundred and ten feet of ascent, or, in other words, an ascent of three hundred and ten feet has upon the thermometer the equivalent effect of a northern movement over a degree of latitude. The wheat-growing plains of the Northwest are not, on an average, nine hundred feet above the Atlantic, a less elevation, indeed, than is given to the old wheat fields of Pennsylvania and New York. We look naturally, then, for a mild climate; but will it be one free from injurious moisture? The mysterious laws which supply the irrigation of the globe are not yet fully comprehended; but we know, as a general thing, in this day, from what springs or sources the rains which are precipitated at any given point are gathered, and where the waters are wafted as vapors in the atmosphere. The rains which fall in the great Northwest are supplied, to a great extent, from the evaporation of the south Pacific ocean; are borne on the south wind's wing through heated and tropic climes, to be partially condensed by contact with the moderate elevations of the Rocky mountain range, and passing on over elevated plains yield their remaining moisture to the colder atmospheric currents of the northeast, and are precipitated on the plains of the Northwest to give life and vigor to vegetation.

While on the Pacific slope the annual precipitation taking place, mainly in a few months, is from sixty to eighty inches of water; in the upper Mississippi it does not exceed thirty inches. We have then a climate not surcharged with vapor, and where dry winds prevent injury to the harvest. It embraces all the upper Mississippi, the Red River of the North, and all that region where the isothermal lines of Humboldt mark a temperature of 60° for the summer months.

I must confess that I look to this part of our continent as an important field for cereal productions, and the outlet to which must be through our own country or through the Canadas; and when I remember that the States on which we were formerly dependent for flour have ceased to become important producers of wheat—that Ohio, New York, and Pennsylvania severally produce less annually by several million bushels than in 1840, and that Europe itself is to be largely supplied by American productions—it seems to me that we should pursue a policy calculated to preserve the most friendly relations with the agriculturists of the British provinces.

But, sir, my views go further than that. There are political considerations affecting this question. The people of western Canada are of our own blood and race, and I regretted to hear the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] the other day use language imputing to them hostility to us in the great struggle in which we are engaged. I did not like to hear him speak of resolutions passed in Toronto, or in Kingston, or elsewhere as indicating the true sentiment of the Canadian people. It is a falsehood; it is a libel. Sir, I know the Canadian people.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman does not intend to impute falsehood to me?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Of course, I do not. I mean only to say that those resolutions give a false impression of the sentiments of the people of Canada.

Mr. PIKE. I did not speak of any resolutions adopted in Canada.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I thought the gentleman did. I perhaps received that impression from a personal statement. I listened with emotion and with considerable excitement to the picture which the gentleman drew of the depredations upon our commerce, of the waves of the ocean lighted up at night by the fires of our burning merchantmen. But did the gentleman mean to say that the people of Canada are responsible for that?

I know that the public meetings sympathizing with the rebellion which have been held in Canada have been directed and controlled by refugees, by men who have fled from the South because they were not only traitors but cowards; they have dictated the resolutions and controlled these public demonstrations, and given tone to what the gentleman calls the public sentiment of Canada. I undertake to say that the people of Western Canada are friendly to us, and sympathize with us in our present struggle. They are most of them of American descent, and I do not think it is worth while for us to attempt to get up difficulties between people of the same race and blood. Sir, let us bide our time. Years tame the current of human passion. The prejudices of the past yield to the present; the prejudices of the present will yield to the convictions of the future, and if we pursue the even tenor of our way and act, as we should do, in a fair and honorable manner, we shall find that the people of Canada by and by, freed of necessity from the restraints of the power of Great Britain, will become either an independent empire, united to us by the most intimate and friendly ties of commercial and social intercourse, or will become an integral part of this Union, when the banner which floats over you will become the emblem of sovereignty from the Gulf of Mexico to the Arctic ocean.

Sir, I am not ashamed to intimate to the Government of Great Britain that we are ready to revise the treaty. I am not prepared to say to them that we are ready to abrogate it. Doubtless it does need revision and amendment, and I hope that measures will be adopted here that will secure a new convention, and which will give the President authority to signify to the Government of Great Britain our dissatisfaction with the present operation of the treaty: and if that be done, I have no doubt that Great Britain will receive the intimation kindly, and will meet us without anger, prejudice, or passion. I do not believe that our dignity will be at all promoted by employing the language of threat or menace. It is a practical business question, and should be treated in a business-like and common-sense manner.

I intended, sir, offering an amendment leaving the matter discretionary with the President, but this necessity may be obviated by the amendment proposed since I took the floor.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELIOT obtained the floor, but yielded it to Mr. WILSON, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at half past four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 25, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of Salisbury, New Hampshire, praying for the abolition of slavery, and for the adoption of such an amendment to the Constitution as will forever prohibit its existence in any portion of our common country; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. McDOUGALL presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of San Francisco, remonstrating against the taxing of the gross products of the mines in the Pacific States and Territories; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg leave to present the memorial of the banks of New Orleans, which states that during the possession of that city by the confederates they were forced to take confederate currency, and they received it upon special deposit from their customers with the understanding in writing, as I recollect, that they were to have the right to pay back the debt consequent upon the deposit in the same currency. They allege, however, that after General Butler got possession of the city he issued an order compelling them to pay to those depositors in gold and silver or in their own currency the amount of the deposit, the result of which was that they have been compelled to make themselves responsible in our currency for an amount of nearly a million dollars. They ask that the tax which Congress has imposed or is about to impose upon currency may not be imposed upon that portion of their circulation until they shall have an opportunity of testing before the courts the legality of that order. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to present a memorial from the president of the New Jersey State Medical Society, which, with the permission of the Senate, I will read. It is as follows:

To the Military Committee of the American Congress:

As president of the State Medical Society of New Jersey, and for the time being a humble representative of the profession in this State, I have been requested to give my views, so far as I believe them to represent those of the physicians of the State, in respect to the application made to the honorable members of Congress, through their Military Committee, in reference to the rank in certain medical departments of the Army. It has long been a subject of regret, not only in our profession and among those immediately interested, but with others of high standing in the Army and in civil life, that to the Army surgeon there has not been accorded the same opportunity of promotion, as a reward for valuable and acknowledged superiority, as to those belonging to other grades. If any man in an army is strictly identified with it it is the surgeon. In the camp or on the field, with the garrison or at the post, in the siege or the advance, he must ever be on the alert. The value of human life is the measure of his responsibility. His professional duties are in a military way, under military discipline, modified by all the circumstances of military law, and he is by plain interpretation a military man. He brings not only himself but his profession to the service of his country. In addition to strictly professional aid he has large executive responsibility. Not unfrequently the duties of a commissary, a quartermaster, a director, an inspector, a purveyor, devolve upon him. Often by direct appointment he performs the duties assigned to the higher grades of military authority.

Plain, old-fashioned justice seems to suggest that when thus rising in the scale of real, admitted merit, he should not be debarred the only recognition which military regulation can confer. A case illustrative and not isolated is familiar to me. A young gentleman of this State, favored with all that social position and high culture could bestow, twenty-five years since entered the Army as an assistant surgeon. In camp and hospital, in garrisoned forts and at frontier outposts, he shared with others the vicissitudes of military life. Through all the exposures of the Mexican war, amid the perils of guerrilla warfare and the still more secret shafts of pestilential air, he did his duty. At the outbreak of the rebellion he was summoned as medical director of the eighth Army corps. Amid the trying days of Maryland patriotism, twenty thousand sick and wounded men looked to him for superintending care. The position needed him but it had no rank or emolument to confer. Privates, corporals, and captains who began with him their military career, and numbers who started but recently, have long outstripped his rank, only because the law of promotion with them has permitted it. Yet the medical director still grades in rank as before, and must live on the pay of a major. The same is true of medical purveyors. The profession at large as well as our brethren in the Army feel this to be an oversight. So palpable is this exception to military justice, that we believe your honorable body will permit it no longer. Without the éclat of military success or the power of systematized political effort to press these claims, we feel that if we can only fasten your attention upon it, what is due to the country as much as to them will not be overlooked. The English and the French armies have different and more complete orders of rank for the medical corps. The surgeon of the Russian fleet, at the entertainment by Governor Bradford at Annapolis stated the progressive rank of our profession in the Russian army as much higher than in our own. The profession in this State beg the honor of uniting with the American Medical Association, with the patriot physicians of the Army, and with those who in military and civil life recognize the humble claims of the medical corps, in praying your honorable body to grant such increase of rank to surgeons holding chief executive and administrative places as shall accord with their position and merits.

I have the honor to be, with profound respect to your honorable committee,
EZRA M. HUNT,
President of New Jersey State Medical Society.

I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.
The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That R. W. Meade have leave to withdraw his memorial and other papers from the files of the Senate.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the select committee on slavery and freedmen, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 286) to prohibit the discharge of persons from liability to military duty by reason of the payment of money, reported it with amendments.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Ida Hoffman, widow of Solomon Hoffman, who was killed on the 14th of March, 1863, while in the performance of his duties as deputy provost marshal in the State of Indiana, in arresting deserters, praying for a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 289) for the relief of Ida Hoffman. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. William Whistler, widow of the late Colonel William Whistler, United States Army, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 149) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Portland to Dalles City, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. No. 45) in relation to the taking of a census in the year 1865, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. No. 53) providing for the taking of a census of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the subject being embraced in the preceding joint resolution; and the report was agreed to.

VOTING IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. WADE. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution (S. No. 57) to amend the charter of the city of Washington, that I reported here yesterday, the object of which is to correct the registry of votes in the District.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports are still in order.

Mr. WADE. If I have the floor I want to know if it is in order for me to move to postpone all prior orders, even if reports are in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires the Chair to receive reports. The Chair, with the permission of the Senate—of course the Chair will be guided by the decision of the Senate—is desirous of holding to the rules to get through reports, and then other business will be in order.

Mr. WADE. My inquiry is, if it is in order to make a motion to take up the resolution, to test the sense of the Senate on that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The practice has been both ways, as the Chair understands, sometimes one way and sometimes the other; but the Chair will be guided by the sense of the Senate. The rule requires that the Chair should receive reports. The Chair will put the question on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, and that will guide the Chair on this occasion. It is moved by the Senator from Ohio that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution indicated by him.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yesterday morning during the morning hour there was a bill, on my motion, taken up and the Senate proceeded at some length to consider it, but when the hour of one o'clock arrived it went over until to-day. I shall be obliged to object to this proposition of the Senator from Ohio if it is to interfere with that bill coming up.

Mr. WADE. I am not generally very obtrusive here; I occupy but very little time; but I reported this resolution from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and there seems to be a necessity, if it is to be acted upon at all, for it to be acted upon soon. It relates to voting here in the District, and is designed to give every voter an opportunity fairly to vote and to prevent favoritism and fraud; as I understand it. It is deemed right and proper to the people here that that resolution should pass. If it is to pass it must be passed very soon to be effectual, and therefore I ask the sense of the Senate on the motion to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that the resolution to which the Senator refers has not been returned from the printer. The Chair will finish receiving reports, if there be no objection.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES—AGAIN.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following resolutions, petitions, and memorial, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

Resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of a grant of land for the endowment of Olathe college in that State;

Two petitions of citizens of Iowa, praying for an extension of the act of March 3, 1857, for the relief of purchasers of swamp lands;

Two petitions of citizens of California, praying for the repeal of an act entitled "An act to grant the right of preemption to certain purchasers on the Soscol Ranch in the State of California," approved March 3, 1863; and

A memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of a grant of lands to aid in the construction of the Southern Minnesota railroad.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills and joint resolution, reported them severally without amendment and with a recommendation that they be postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. No. 71) to authorize a loan on the security of the public lands of the United States, and to promote the sale and settlement of the same;

A bill (S. No. 74) to secure homesteads to persons in the military service of the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 22) in reference to lands belonging to certain States.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 205) authorizing the issue of patents for locations made with certificates granted under authority of the act of Congress, approved March 17, 1862, allowing floats in satisfaction of lands sold by the United States within the limits of the Las Ormigas and La Nana grants in Louisiana, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WADE. I am instructed by the Committee on Territories, to whom the subject was referred, to report a bill (S. No. 291) to amend an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States."

The bill was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. WADE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill, inasmuch as it ought to be passed at once.

Mr. DAVIS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it cannot be considered now.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 290) to increase the facilities of telegraph communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States and the Territory of Idaho; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 58) in relation to the professors of the Military Academy at West Point; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HALE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 292) to provide for the efficiency of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

APPOINTMENT OF MILITARY OFFICERS.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Whereas large corps have been and are now being organized in the military service of the United States without the advice and consent of the Senate in the appointment and commissioning of the officers thereof:

Be it therefore resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be, and they hereby are, directed to report a bill to the Senate requiring that all appointments in the service aforesaid heretofore made, or which may hereafter be made, shall have the advice and consent of the Senate, as provided by law in other cases, and that the commissions of all officers not receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to their nominations will expire with the present session of Congress.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will consent to modify that resolution. As it now stands it is in the form of a positive instruction to the committee. I hope it will be put in the usual form, instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of doing this, and not proposing a direct vote of instruction to report a particular bill. I have no doubt the committee will be very glad to enter into an examination of the subject, without being told positively what to do.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I have no objection to that modification; but it seemed to me that the case was so clear—as must be apparent to every Senator when he reflects—that it was well to take action at once. To-day the Government of the United States is organizing an invalid corps and negro troops, and appointing officers for them without the knowledge, advice, or consent of the coordinate branch of the Government which by the Constitution is intrusted with a share of the appointing power. In the regular Army, in the signal corps, in every other corps of the Army, and in the marine corps and in the Navy, the advice and consent of the Senate are required to all nominations. I suppose there has been a simple omission in the law regulating the organization of these corps.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that a bill is now being prepared under the care of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] in regard to the invalid corps and for its reorganization. He has had that subject under advisement some little time, and I believe good progress is being made. As to the organization of colored troops, Congress passed an act empowering the President to embody and to organize and officer those troops, without requiring that the nominations of the officers should come to the Senate. It may be best, however, to pass a bill requiring that the names should come here for confirmation. I hope the resolution will not be adopted in the form in which it is proposed; and I move to amend it by striking out the words "directed to report" and inserting "directed to inquire into the expediency of reporting."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 484) to incorporate the Newsboys' Home; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAMUEL HOOPER of Massachusetts, Mr. E. B. WASHBURN of Illinois, and Mr. ROBERT MALLORY of Kentucky, managers at the same on its part.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, and agree to the conference asked for on the bank bill. The House have agreed to all the amendments except four, I understand, and on those they ask for a conference.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not so understand. I understood they had agreed to part of our amendments and disagreed to others, without asking for a committee of conference.

Mr. SHERMAN. They ask for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. SHERMAN, FOSTER, and JOHNSON were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 484) to incorporate the Newsboys' Home was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill of the House (No. 192) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1865, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate to the said bill; and

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Finance.

SIOUX INDIAN DEPREDACTIONS.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move to take up House bill No. 377, which was up yesterday morning.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope not. I hope that resolutions will be called for.

Mr. HENDRICKS and Mr. CARLILE. What is the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be read.

The Secretary read the title, namely: A bill (H. R. No. 377) making appropriations for the payment of the awards made by the commissioners appointed under and by virtue of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of persons for damages sustained by reason of the depredations and injuries by certain bands of Sioux Indians," approved February 16, 1863.

Mr. WILKINSON. I will simply state that this bill was up yesterday morning, and the Senate considered it until the hour of one o'clock arrived, when it was laid over at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, by whose committee it was reported, that it should lie over until the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN,] who made the report, was in his seat. I presume there will be no debate upon it whatever. It is a matter local to our State, and I hope it will be done.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I hope we shall have resolutions considered.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to that bill being taken up. It is now about a week since resolutions were called for, and I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to take up the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 31, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Davis, McDougall, Powell, Richardson, and Saulsbury—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Doolittle, Fessenden, Harding, Henderson, Hicks, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Wade, and Wright—11.

So the motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have not a copy of the bill before me. I wish to inquire if it is reported by the Finance Committee.

Mr. RAMSEY. It has been reported by the Finance Committee unanimously.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

DISLOYAL INDIANS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be requested to consider the question of confiscating the reserves of all Indian tribes who are, or have been, in arms against the Government, and providing homes for the loyal members of such tribes and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. DAVIS. If it is not to lead to any debate I do not object, but if it is I object. I want the ordinary rule enforced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection?

Mr. DAVIS. I object.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky there will be no discussion; it is a mere resolution of inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it must lie over.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the sixteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: strike out the word "Legislature" in the said amendment and in lieu thereof insert "Governor."

CONDITION OF MEXICO.

Mr. WADE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, any correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Mexican minister in relation to the course of trade between France and the United States, while France and Mexico were at war with each other, in articles supposed to be in derogation of the rights of neutrals, and also all other information in possession of the Government relative to the present condition of affairs in the Republic of Mexico, and especially upon the attempt of any European Powers to overthrow republican institutions on this continent with a view of establishing monarchical forms of government in their stead.

SENATOR FROM ARKANSAS.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President—
Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I rise to a question of privilege—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his question.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move that the usual oath be administered to Hon. William M. Fishback, Senator elect from the State of Arkansas. I believe it has been considered a question of privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I make that motion.
Mr. SUMNER. I beg to inquire if there is not a motion already pending with reference to the credentials of the gentleman?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a motion to refer the credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary which takes precedence of the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SUMNER. I presumed so.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to make a brief statement to the Senate before the vote is taken.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to be informed what is the motion before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To refer the credentials of the member elect from Arkansas to the Committee on the Judiciary—a motion made last week.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The people of Arkansas in primary assemblies in forty-two counties out of fifty-four elected delegates to a State convention; that convention met and amended the constitution of the State, prohibiting slavery or involuntary servitude, and prohibiting the apprenticeship system as regards all persons over twenty-one years of age. In that convention, as I before stated, forty-two counties out of fifty-four were represented. The constitution so amended was submitted to the people of that State for their adoption or rejection. At that election 12,177 votes were cast for the amended constitution and 226 against it, on a vote of 54,000, that being the vote the year before the State seceded from the Union, almost one fourth of the entire vote of the State, and believed to be a majority of the legal voters in the State at the time the constitution was voted upon. The convention provided for the election of State officers and members of the Legislature on the day that the amended constitution was adopted. In that election the same number of votes were cast, over 12,000. The Legislature, composed of seventy-five members, forty-eight out of the fifty-four counties in the State being represented, elected Mr. Fishback and Mr. Baxter his colleague; Mr. Fishback in the place of Mr. Sebastian, whose term of service would have expired on the 4th of March, 1865, and Mr. Baxter in the place of Mr. Mitchell, whose term of service would have expired on the 4th of March, 1867.

Mr. HALE. I will ask the Senator how it is that the State of Arkansas has sent a man here now to occupy a seat that will not be vacant until 1865?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The former Senators were expelled, and these Senators have been elected to fill the vacancies occasioned by their expulsion.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. Sebastian was not expelled, I take it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I so understand. I understand that both the former Senators were expelled by a vote of the Senate since I have been a member of the body.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like very well to be informed by the Senator from Kansas under what authority this so-called State election has been held: first, under what authority was the convention of the people of Arkansas held, who directed the calling of an election for the purpose of electing members of the convention; and secondly, under what authority the members of the so-called State Legislature of that State were chosen? He will of course observe that these are very important inquiries that must be met at the threshold of this discussion.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I do not propose to detain the Senate except to state that the people of Arkansas in this movement have followed the proclamation of the President called the amnesty proclamation. The voter was compelled before he cast his ballot to take the oath recited in that proclamation. The people met, as I believe they have a right to meet, and elected delegates to a State convention—an inalienable right in my opinion, an American one, at least—amended their constitution, submitted it to the people, elected their Legislature, and that Legislature elected these Senators. I do not see anything to refer. The credentials are regular. Arkansas was represented upon this floor for twenty-eight years. The credentials are filed in accordance with the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States. The people of Arkansas, in their representative capacity, forty-eight counties out of fifty-four, elected these Senators.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I put to the honorable Senator from Kansas two questions, the object of which was to ascertain by what authority the elections were held in Arkansas which have resulted, as it appears, in the delegation of this gentleman, Mr. Fishback, from that State, as a member of this body. I do not understand that the honorable Senator has given us any authority, or referred to any, except that contained in the proclamation of the President of the United States, commonly known as the amnesty proclamation. I am not about to say anything respecting that proclamation. The time, however, may come when it may be necessary for members of this body to take it into consideration, and to express an opinion as to the right and power of the Executive of the United States to issue such an instrument for the purpose of the reorganization, or reconstruction, no matter which term is used, of the rebellious States. All I know at present in regard to Arkansas is this, and the tale is a very simple one: on the 6th of May, 1861, a convention of the people of that State, held, as we are bound to presume, under some law of the State of Arkansas, passed an ordinance commonly called an ordinance of secession, and in the course of that ordinance they make this strange declaration:

"That we do hereby further ordain and declare that the State of Arkansas hereby resumes to herself all rights and powers heretofore delegated to the Government of the United States of America; that her citizens are absolved from all allegiance to said Government of the United States, and that she is in full possession and exercise of all the rights of sovereignty which appertain to a free and independent State."

That ordinance was passed in that convention by a vote 69 pro to 1 con., being a majority of 68. I find further on looking at the history of the proceedings in that State that on the 17th of May, 1861, the then so-called State of Arkansas was admitted into the rebel confederacy as a member of that confederacy under its then provisional constitution, and that its delegation to the rebel congress consisted of the following persons: 1. R. W. Johnson, of Pine Bluff; 2. A. Rust, of Little Rock; 3. A. H. Garland, of Little Rock; 4. W. W. Watkins, of Carrollton; 5. H. F. Thomasson, of Van Buren. That seems to have been the status or condition of the State of Arkansas at that date.

Now in what way it has become a loyal State and has restored itself legitimately, constitutionally, and properly into the Union of the United States, is a most important question. What we know is that that entire community known as the State of Arkansas has been in arms against the Government of the United States from the date of this ordinance of secession down to the present time, and that, if the authority of the United States is maintained and upheld anywhere within the limits of that State, it is thus upheld, not by the free consent of the people of that State, but by virtue of the superior military strength of the Government of the United States, who hold it in the Union now only and solely by force of military occupation.

Sir, I for one must confess, and I take this early occasion to say, that I am totally opposed to readmitting into the Union a State whose Unionism consists solely in the exertion of the military power of the United States in order to hold it within its allegiance. The exertion of that military power is a necessity. I trust in Heaven the time will come when this exertion may properly cease; but until that time shall come, until there shall be the free consent of a reasonably numerous portion of the people of the rebellious States, I am totally opposed to the recognition of any of those States as States of the Union. Sir, this war is costing us a little too much in the shape of blood and treasure to allow us to trifle with the subject, and to act the part of boys and children when we are called upon by gentlemen who come here and ask seats within this body. I desire to see a constitutional restoration of the Union, and no bogus restoration of the Union. I wish to see the Union resting upon the assent of the people of the States, and that such measures may be adopted as are best calculated to insure that assent at an early day.

And while I am up I must beg to be allowed to say further that I do not concede to the President of the United States, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, or as the Chief Magistrate of the nation, the power to reconstruct and reestablish this Union, broken up as it has been by a bloody rebellion. I insist that that power belongs, and belongs exclusively, to the Congress of the United States, and not to the Executive of the United States; and that it is our bounden duty to see to it at a reasonably early day, but not, however, in particular haste about it, that such measures are adopted as shall result in the peaceful and permanent restoration of this Union upon constitutional principles.

I do not ask that this resolution may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, or any other committee. I think the Senate is competent to treat this subject in open session, and to dispose of it in such a way as shall be satisfactory to the country and be consistent with our duty to the Constitution and the country.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Mr. President—
Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe the hour has arrived for the regular order of business, and I must ask that it be proceeded with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) This is a question of privilege that it requires a vote of the Senate to supersede.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall take the vote without further debate, and let the resolution go to the committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If there is to be no further debate, very well.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am not willing that it shall go to the committee without debate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There will be debate. Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I move that this subject be postponed, and that the regular order of business be proceeded with.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, accordingly resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in line five of section forty-one, to strike out the word "willingly" and insert "willfully" before "swear."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section forty-three, after the word "prescribed" in line three, to strike out "under the direction of" and insert "by;" so as to read:

That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be, and is hereby, authorized, on appeal to him made, to remit, refund, and pay back all duties erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "and," in line eighteen of section forty-three, to strike out "it is further provided that;" after the word "penalties," in line twenty, to insert "shall;" to strike out "accounted for and" before "paid," in line twenty-one; after the word "paid," in line twenty-one, to strike out "by" and insert "to;" and after the word "and," in line twenty-two, to strike out "also that the" and insert "all;" so as to make the clause read:

And all judgments and moneys recovered or received for taxes, costs, forfeitures, and penalties shall be paid, to the collector as internal duties are required to be paid; and all sums of money which the Commissioner is authorized to pay by virtue of this section shall be paid by drafts drawn on collectors of internal revenue.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following words in lines ten, eleven, twelve, thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen of section forty-five:

The sums which would have been due from the persons residing or holding property, goods, wares, or merchandise, object or article therein liable to any duty, license, or tax, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum thereon from the time such duty, license, or tax ought to have been paid, until paid in the manner and.

And in lieu of them to insert, "taxes in such States and Territories;" so as to make the section read:

Sec. 45. And be it further enacted, That if, for any cause, at any time after this act goes into operation, the laws of the United States cannot be executed in a State or Territory of the United States, or any part thereof, or within the District of Columbia, it shall be the duty of the President, and he is hereby authorized, to proceed to execute the provisions of this act within the limits of such State or Territory, or part thereof, or District of Columbia, so soon as the authority of the United States therein shall be reestablished, and to collect taxes in such States and Territories under the regulations prescribed in this act, as far as applicable; and where not applicable, the assessment and levy shall be made, and the time and manner of collection regulated, by the instructions and directions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-five of section forty-seven, to strike out "shall" and insert "may at the option of the collector."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section forty-seven, line forty-three, to insert after "thereof" the words "the collector;" to insert "collector" before "marshal" in line fifty-four; and to insert "collector or" before "marshal" in lines fifty-nine and sixty respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I presume there is a misprint in line fifty-one of section forty-seven: "appraiser" should be "assessor."

Mr. FESSENDEN. The assessor is made the appraiser; but the amendment had better be made, perhaps.

Mr. HARRIS. I move the amendment to strike out "appraiser" and insert "assessor" in line fifty-one.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. "Appraiser" should be altered to "assessor" also in the fifty-sixth and fifty-eighth lines. I move the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section forty-nine, line four, to insert before "shall" the words "now in force;" after the word "embracing," in line five, to strike out

"any act done under the excise or internal revenue laws of the United States" and insert "all laws for the collection of internal duties, stamp duties, licenses, or taxes;" after "to," in line nine, to insert "assess;" after "receive," in line ten, to strike out "assess;" and after "enumerated," in line fourteen, to insert "or conferred;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 49. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of an act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," approved March 2, 1833, now in force, shall be taken and deemed as extending to and embracing any act done under all laws for the collection of internal duties, stamp duties, licenses, or taxes, which have been or may be hereafter enacted; and all persons duly authorized to assess, receive, or collect such duties or taxes under such laws are hereby declared to be and to have been revenue officers within the true intent and meaning of the said act, and entitled to all the exemptions, immunities, benefits, rights, and privileges therein enumerated or conferred.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section fifty-two, line two, to strike out "applying for license," and insert "required by law to be licensed;" so as to read:

That any person required by law to be licensed as a distiller, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-eight of the same section, after the word "first" to strike out "tenth" and insert "eleventh;" and after the word "and" to strike out "twentieth" and insert "twenty-first;" and in lines thirty-one and thirty-two to strike out the words "taken from his books;" so that the clause will read:

And also that he will render to the said assessor or assistant assessor on the first, eleventh, and twenty-first days of each and every month, or within five days thereafter, during the continuance of said license, an exact account in writing of the number of gallons of spirits distilled, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the same section, to strike out the following clause in lines forty-seven, forty-eight, forty-nine, and fifty:

That he will, at the time of rendering said account, immediately forward to the collector or deputy collector of the district a copy thereof duly certified by the assessor or assistant assessor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifty, after the word "will" to strike out "also" and insert "at the time of rendering said account;" so that the clause will read:

And that he will, at the time of rendering said account, pay to the said collector, or his deputy, the duties which by law are imposed on the spirits so distilled.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendments of the committee were to the fifty-fourth section. The section, as the bill was passed by the House of Representatives, was as follows:

SEC. 54. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the duties payable for licenses herein provided, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all spirits that may be distilled and sold, or distilled and removed for consumption or sale, of first proof, on and after the 1st day of May, 1864, and prior to the 1st day of January, 1865, a duty of $1 on each and every gallon; and on and after January 1, 1865, a duty of $1.25 on each and every gallon; which duty shall be paid by the owner, agent, or superintendent of the still or other vessel in which the said spirits shall have been distilled, within five days after the time of rendering the accounts of spirits so chargeable with duty, required to be rendered by law. And the said duty shall be a lien on such spirits and also on the interest of all persons in default in the distillery used for distilling the same, with all the stills, vessels, fixtures, and tools therein, and in the lot or tract of land upon which the said distillery is situated, until the said duty shall be paid: Provided, That the duty on all spirits shall be collected at no lower rate than the basis of first proof, and shall be increased in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of first proof.

The Committee on Finance proposed to amend the section, so as to make it read:

SEC. 54. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the duties payable for licenses herein provided, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all spirits that may be distilled and sold, or distilled and removed for consumption or sale, of first proof, on or after the 1st day of June, 1864, and prior to the 1st day of October, 1864, a duty of $1 on each and every gallon; and on and after October 1, 1864, and prior to the 1st day of January, 1865, a duty of $1.25 on each and every gallon; and on and after the 1st day of January, 1865, a duty of $1.50 on each and every gallon; which duty shall be paid, &c.

Mr. HOWE. I was not present when these amendments were agreed to by the committee, and I have not been able to recognize the wisdom of them. I think this is the worst time we have yet seen to increase the duty on distilled spirits. I think there is the largest quantity on hand now that probably ever was in the country at any one time. I believe that is the testimony we have from all quarters. I believe it is conceded that there never was so large a quantity on hand. It must also be borne in mind that we are just approaching that season when the distillation of spirits usually ceases. It is the close of the distilling year. The old stock of grain is about worked up. The cattle and the hogs which are fed at the distilleries are disposed of, are marketed, and it is at about this season of the year that distillers usually do, under any circumstances, stop the manufacture for thirty or sixty days, as the case may be, to repair and to fit up for another year's business. If now, at this time, we increase the duty from sixty cents per gallon to one dollar, it seems to me we must expect that it will be a long time before the distillation will start again.

When we were considering this question last winter and it was proposed to graduate the duty upon distilled spirits, the proposition to raise the duty ten cents at a time upon a gallon, I know was regarded by many persons of excellent judgment as an extreme measure. The most radical proposition then made, I think, was to raise the duty twice, and ten cents at a time. Here is a proposition to raise the duty at once forty cents, and to raise it twice thereafter within a little more than six months at twenty-five cents per gallon each time. My own opinion is that I should be willing to vote to increase this duty to one dollar on the 1st of October or the 1st of November, about the time that the new crop comes out and about the time that distillers will want to stock their distilleries for another year's operations. I believe that is as early as we can hope to raise this duty, and get any revenue from the distillation. And now as to the increase after that time, I only wish to say that I am willing to increase the duty just as fast as you can and continue the distillation and not stop the revenue, and to continue it just as long as you find you can do that. I have no sort of doubt but that this beverage will bear the highest rate of duty proposed here. I have thought so from the beginning, and have been among the fastest of those who were making progress toward the highest point, but I must confess that these propositions take me off my gait. I believe the effect of these propositions will be to stop the distillation at once, take every dollar of revenue away from the Treasury for a time, and put a larger fortune than we can spare into the hands of the present holders of liquors.

For that reason I shall concur in these amendments as they now stand. I will very cheerfully concur in a proposition to raise the duty about the 1st of October or November to one dollar, and from that time to raise it as fast as we can. I thought last winter that the business would stand a raise of ten cents at a time, and I think so still. I think now, as I thought then, that that is as fast as we can go in raising these duties.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not intend to discuss this question, but wish simply to state what course I shall pursue in regard to the tax on whisky. I think whisky can bear the rate of taxation proposed by this amendment, and I would be willing to vote for the rate of taxation proposed by the amendment, provided a reasonable tax, such as was put by the House of Representatives upon spirits on hand, be adopted by the Senate. If this tax is put upon the future manufacture, and no tax is put upon the spirits on hand, it is a bounty to the whisky manufacturer and to the dealer in whisky so enormous as to make all engaged in the business very wealthy. I never could see any reason why they ought not to pay a reasonable tax upon the stock on hand, especially when the legislation of Congress tends directly to increase the value of the article on hand which they hold. That principle was adopted in raising the tariff the other day.

I wish, therefore, to await action on this proposition until we vote upon the proposition to strike out the tax upon spirits on hand. I shall not now object to the tax proposed by this amendment of the committee, but I simply give notice that when the amendment relative to the tax upon spirits on hand is before the Senate at the close of this bill, I shall make another effort, perhaps a fruitless one, to retain the tax proposed by the House of Representatives upon spirits on hand; and in case that is refused, I think the tax proposed by this amendment on the future manufacture is too high. I believe it will at once stop all distillation of spirits, prevent our getting any revenue for a year or two, and will simply inure as a bounty to the manufacturer and the holder of whisky. That is the course I shall pursue; I do not wish to take up time in discussing the question now.

Mr. POMEROY. Before I vote on this amendment, I should like to have the question settled whether we are to tax whisky on hand. I agree in what the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] has said. While I do not think this tax is too high, I believe it will stop the manufacture for the time being, and, in my opinion, it ought to be stopped. The Government is buying corn now for the Army at an enormous price, and it is made large by this very demand for the use of corn in the manufacture of whisky. If this amendment be adopted just as the committee have reported it I think it will stop the manufacture of whisky, and I shall vote for it with that view. We have got enough on hand. As the Senator from Wisconsin has said, this is the season to stop. The old crop of corn on hand ought not to be gone into for the manufacture of whisky; the Government is buying all it can buy, and buying it now at an enormous price, made so by the demand for corn for the manufacture of whisky. I think that if we impose a tax of one dollar a gallon from and after the passage of the act it will suspend the operations of the distillers for the time being; but as soon as the new crop of corn comes in the price of that will be regulated by the demand of the distillers, and I am willing that they shall manufacture the new crop under this increased tax. But while the Government is buying all the surplus corn in the country I do not propose to encourage the manufacture of it into whisky. It is not a good financial measure to encourage it. We ought rather to suspend the manufacture for the time being. The men who have been dealing largely in it have been holding the amount of whisky they have on hand, and I think it is time for them to sell it; they ought to sell it. We should not encourage the manufacture of another gallon to add to the value of the old corn crop on hand; but for the purpose of supporting the Army the Government should be allowed to purchase the old crop of corn, not at present prices, but at reduced prices, because the reduction of price would be the effect of stopping the manufacture of whisky.

If the committee had reported this amendment in another shape, so as to tax whisky one dollar or even one dollar and half a gallon from and after the passage of this act, and two dollars a gallon within a year from that time, so as to take in the next year's crop, instead of proposing to do the work piecemeal, as the surgeon cut off the man's leg, I think it would have been better. I do not think there is any policy in raising the tax ten cents at a time. We should go up in a sliding scale, to be sure; but I do not think we ought to slide more than twice. I would have a tax assessed upon what is on hand, and upon all manufactured after the date of the passage of the act; and then the larger tax I would put on a year from that time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is undoubtedly at present in the country a very large stock of whisky, perhaps enough to answer the demand for a year. How that may be, I do not know; but the stock on hand is larger probably than it has been at any previous period; for since we commenced the discussion of this topic last winter undoubtedly the distillers have been running with all the force they could muster; and a very large quantity has been produced in view of the increase of the tax. Whether when the time comes, that is, when we arrive at the end of the bill, where the section is which the Committee on Finance propose to strike out, we shall, with a view to revenue, agree with the House of Representatives to lay a tax upon the liquor on hand, or whether we shall agree to adhere to our former decision, and lay no such tax, will be for the Senate then to decide.

In settling a question of this description, however, I do not see the force of the argument of my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] founded on the idea that he would lay this duty, because otherwise a certain set of men will make a great deal of money. I have no disposition to legislate either to help men make money or to prevent their making money. That, it strikes me, is a very trifling consideration when you are attempting to digest a great system which is to endure not only for this year but also is to answer our purpose through many succeeding years. We must act with reference to the great question of raising revenue under the bill we pass; and the incidental result, whether thereby we deprive this set of men or that set of men of money they would otherwise make, or whether we are to legislate it into their pockets, may be considered collaterally, but I take it, that is not to influence the great question.

Now, sir, leaving that question to be settled, so far as the particular quantity of liquor on hand is concerned, till the time when we arrive at it, let me state what the committee had in view in reference to the amendments which they have proposed to this section. We do not suppose that from the 1st day of June (if we should get through the bill and it should become a law by that day) by raising the rate of duty at that time and from thence to the 1st of October, we shall effect much in the way of producing revenue; and why? Because, as is stated by Senators, that is the time when the old crop is pretty much used up; there is not much of it on hand; the cattle and hogs are disposed of; and the distillers do not usually operate to any considerable extent at that period of the year. If we lay a largely increased duty upon it at that time, it will operate in aid of what is their general practice, to stop operations. I agree with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] that if that should be the effect, the little we lose in one particular will be more than made up by what we shall probably gain in another; because if we lay no additional duty on the 1st of June—and that day is only fixed as a supposed day—we mean to put it into effect the very earliest day that we can pass the bill, and of course as to the date we shall be guided by the progress that the bill makes; if we omit to lay any additional duty on the 1st of June, and let it go till the 1st of October, we hold out a direct inducement and a very strong inducement, to distillers to keep their distilleries in operation, and to use up as much corn as they can in the intermediate time with a view to increase the quantity manufactured before that time as much as possible, because then there will be a large increase of duty.

Therefore it is advisable with reference to both those considerations, in fact. We may gain very little now, owing to the reduced crop, by making the increase take effect at once; but on the other hand we might lose largely in the increase of the price of the raw material, which is needed for the consumption of our Army; and therefore it was deemed advisable, in the judgment of the committee, to increase the duty at the present time. Taken in connection with the fact that the distilleries cannot ordinarily run to advantage in this particular period of the year until the new crop comes in, the result would be, if you please, to operate either to prevent the distillation, in which case we should not lose much, or if they went on to distill they would pay a duty upon it; and in either case we should not get the stock so largely increased between now and October; and I believe that view to be a sound one.

Then we change from the 1st of January to the 1st of October for the reason that has been suggested; and that is, that then the new crop comes in, and then the distilleries begin their operations. We thought it best that the Government should have the advantage of the large manufacture that would probably take place for the three months between the 1st of October and the 1st of January. That is the view with which we changed the time when the duty of $1 25 should go into effect from the 1st of January, 1865, to the 1st of October, 1864. Then the question arose whether we should still further increase the duty on the 1st of January next. At that time I suppose the distilleries are all largely in operation; they have got their cattle and hogs, &c., and they have got their stock of raw materials on hand. The question with reference to that was simply whether the article would bear the increased rate. I have no doubt that it will bear that rate and a larger rate. I have no doubt it will bear two dollars. The rate in England is $2 80, or thereabouts, upon the manufacture of this article, and the large duty has been found in practice not to diminish the quantity apparently, while it largely increases the revenue in consequence of the quantity being increased instead of diminished. The truth is it is an article that you cannot prohibit the manufacture of by duties if they are anywhere within a reasonable limit.

With that view the House of Representatives having expressed its opinion that $1 25 should be the extent of taxation, we having the opinion in our committee that the duty should not be laid on the whisky on hand, but should be laid as largely as we could reasonably expect it would bear on the article to be manufactured hereafter, we have proposed to increase it a quarter of a dollar after the 1st of January next, and bring it up to $1 50. I have no doubt myself that it might be carried even higher; but all these things are progressive. When we began, with much doubt and much hesitation, we fixed it at twenty cents; we did not think it could go any higher than that, and now we find in the opinion of everybody that we may go up much higher. I think we may go very much higher, and put on the increased duties better now than then, because it does not do to shake the country even in times of war more than we can help. It requires time for men to accustom themselves to an idea, if it is a new idea, and to get familiar with it, and as they get familiar with it they pass to it and understand it, and find they can get along a great deal better with the consequence of carrying it out than they supposed.

Then comes the important question suggested by my friend from Ohio; and I will say one single word upon it with a view of laying down a general principle. Gentlemen in both Houses of Congress and the people of the country are anxious to obtain as much revenue as possible out of this article. It is a subject peculiarly fit for revenue. It is one of those things that you can legislate upon and get money out of without doing injury to anybody; for how much you make a man pay for his drinks is of no sort of consequence. It is a good thing for the country; and if he will diminish the quantity that he does drink, we gain in that way. I have never yet been convinced that a cent or two more or less on a glass of liquor made any difference to a man who wanted to drink it. It certainly does not to me, [laughter,] and I am not so fond of it as a great many other people.

But, sir, in putting a system of this kind into operation, you must give it time. The idea that you can inaugurate a great system of taxation all at once, lay your hand upon all the sources of revenue, and that you can get everything out of it by your legislation, is, in my judgment, a perfectly fallacious notion. If we wanted revenue for this year alone, and must have it at all hazards, I might consent to do many things that in the present condition of things I do not think wise; but, as I said before, we are legislating for a long series of years. We must not only have revenue this year, but we must have it the next year, and the year after that, and so on; we do not know how long, probably longer than I shall live and many others of us. You must therefore be content to be patient and wait for any system to get into operation. No great one ever goes into operation and takes full effect in a month, or a year, or perhaps longer. We have inaugurated this system. We are now getting our twenty cents. For a long time we did not get that, owing to the stock on hand. We are now getting our sixty cents on a large portion of it under the bill that we passed last winter. So far, so good; but there was much on hand then upon which we did not get the twenty cents, but only on that which has been made since. It will operate thus in all cases. The time will come, and that shortly, when we can put these laws with reference to revenue in full operation. Why? Because before a very long time the stock on hand must disappear; it must be used up; it must be gone; the appetites of men and the needs of men in manufactures and in other directions for the use of liquor will use it, and then the system will be in full operation. We must frame our system with reference to these well-known facts, which are familiar to all of us on a moment's reflection.

I do not propose to anticipate any discussion that may take place upon that question, but simply to enunciate a general principle and to suggest to gentlemen that in order to make the system what it should be we must give time for it to accommodate itself to the existing state of facts among the people.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe Mr. Lincoln is the author of the sentiment, at least he repeated it, "the world moves on." At the first part of this session I thought the proposition to tax whisky at the rate of sixty cents a gallon almost an alarming proposition. It seemed to me to be such a high tax upon a western production that I felt it to be my duty to oppose it. I do not now propose, when we have come up to the proposition to tax whisky a dollar a gallon, to oppose it. I am satisfied it is the sentiment of the Senate that the production shall be taxed at that rate; but upon one or two practical questions I desire the attention of the Senate, and particularly of the Finance Committee.

It is proposed to tax this article at one rate for a while, and then at another rate for another period. If that be adopted as the idea of this bill, then the times ought to be so fixed as not seriously to interfere with the business which is taxed. The 1st of October and the 1st of January are the two most unfortunate periods in the whole year at which to change the rate of taxation. You can do it at the 1st of June and not materially interfere with the interests of the men engaged in this pursuit; but if you take the 1st of January, and double the tax at that time, it would materially interfere with the business. The business of the distiller is not alone to produce whisky, but, to make his pursuit profitable, he must feed stock, cattle, and hogs; and when he buys his stock of corn in the fall he must also, to make his business profitable, buy his stock of hogs and cattle, so as to use up during the winter, and the proper season of distilling, that which does not go into whisky.

You propose then to tax whisky at a certain rate from this time until the 1st of January, and then increase the tax fifty per cent. What is the effect? You stimulate the production of whisky unnaturally until the 1st of January, and then your legislation has a tendency to stop the production. Right in the middle of winter, when the cattle and hogs are on hand and being fed, you take away the motive to produce whisky. In other words—I desire the point to be understood by the Senate—this policy tends to make whisky and whisky only, while the policy of the Senate ought to be, not the production of whisky, but to encourage the feeding of stock. You encourage the production of whisky at an unnatural rate up to a particular period when you ought not to stop for the reason that you need to feed the stock during the balance of the season.

I shall not oppose the tax of a dollar a gallon; but surely Senators will admit that that is a very high tax. I think Senators will admit that there is nothing in the execution of the former law or of the law that we passed during the early part of the session which justifies us in saying that this interest ought to be taxed higher than a dollar a gallon. The bill admits that it ought not now be taxed more than a dollar. That is the proposition of the committee; that one dollar is a very high tax. I believe it is five times the tax that was imposed two years ago. It is an increase over the tax two years ago of five hundred per cent. Is not that enough?

Senators may say that whisky will still be produced. The Senator from Maine suggested that whatever almost may be the tax, within a reasonable limit, the production will go on and the consumption of whisky will go on. That may be so; but surely the Senator will admit that you may tax this production at such a rate as that corn will cease to go into whisky, as that men cannot produce it and sell it. While I was in the State of Indiana recently, I consulted some gentlemen on this subject and they expressed the opinion, that a tax of a dollar on the gallon would very seriously decrease the production, and a tax of $1 50 would almost stop the production of whisky. That is their opinion. To be sure, we cannot tell whether that will be so or not; but it is very certain that you may tax to a point that will stop production, that will be prohibitory. Then what is the effect of it? Not to produce revenue, but to prevent a very important western production.

Representing to some extent this interest, In diana producing a very large amount of whisky and having a very large corn production, a portion of which goes into whisky, I am going to ask Senators to so arrange this bill as not right in the middle of the winter time to change the rate of taxation, but that that change of rate shall be fixed at a period of the year, say the 1st of June, that will not very seriously interfere with the business of the distiller, especially as regards the raising of cattle and hogs, useful to the country generally, useful to the Army, useful in every respect. The Senate ought not to fix a time at which these rates shall be increased which will interfere with that which all concede to be useful to the country.

The proposition that I now make to the Senate is that this sliding scale shall be fixed to take effect on the 1st of June, and that there shall be no change from the 1st of June, 1864, until the 1st of June, 1865. Is it not a short time, one year, during which the law shall operate? Do you so treat any other interest of the country, taxing it at one rate for three months, and then at another rate for three months again, and still a third rate to be fixed? Is it not a fair suggestion that I make to Senators, that in view of the true interests of the distiller and of the whole corn interest of the Northwest you shall allow the rate that is fixed for the 1st of June to continue for one entire year, and then, if Senators believe there ought to be an increase, let it be fixed to take place on the 1st of June? Distillers on the 1st of June are about stopping their operations. They have fattened their stock and sold it, and have not much on hand. Then if you discourage this production of whisky during the summer months, as was suggested by the Senator from Kansas, it is all well enough; I have no objection to that; but during the winter months when the stock is on hand and the supply for that stock, it ought not to be cut off. It is not wise policy to increase the tax at that time.

If Senators are not content that a dollar shall be the rate of taxation—an increase of five hundred per cent. for one short year—then let them make it more. It is better for these distillers that you shall fix it at $1 25 and let that $1 25 run through the entire year, than that you shall fix it at one dollar now and raise it a quarter of a dollar in the middle of the winter.

It seems to me this is but a fair proposition. Senators are not willing that their interests shall be submitted to a system of taxation that fluctuates and changes from time to time. This interest, as well as all other interests of the country, requires stability of legislation, that it shall accommodate itself for some considerable period of time to the taxation which is imposed; but you change it. For a few months you encourage production, and then you encourage speculation. It seems to me the Senate can secure the interests of the act with a view to revenue and at the same time protect what are the true interests of the Northwest in this production.

In respect to the suggestions of the Senator from Ohio in his proposition to tax the article on hand at this time, I have nothing to say except this: two or three months ago the Senate said deliberately, and by a very large vote, that it would not agree to the proposition of the House of Representatives that the article which had already paid a tax should be taxed again. That was the deliberate judgment of the Senate, and that, too, after a very bitter contest with the House. The whole country thought that the Senate had adopted that as its policy, that the article should not be taxed a second time. Acting upon that men have traded in this article; they have bought and sold.

The Senator says a large profit has been made. That profit has been anticipated. The present price of liquor shows that. Since the legislation two or three months ago liquor has gone up in the market very much, and men have anticipated the present increase. One man has sold at a profit of one or two cents; his purchaser has sold at a profit of three or four cents it may be, until in the hands of the present holder there may be but a very small and a very reasonable profit. If you tax the article in the hand of the present purchaser, who has purchased upon the faith of the action of the Senate, you destroy him. I say the Senate ought not to do it. It owes it to itself, it owes it to the trade of the country that has gone on in its ordinary channels, not to depart from the policy which in a protracted struggle with the House of Representatives three months ago it declared should be its policy.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. President, this production is a very large one in the State that I in part represent, and I desire to submit a very few observations upon the proposition now under discussion.

I agree with the Senator from Indiana, after conversing as fully and freely as I could with the manufacturers at home, that they could bear this duty at a dollar a gallon; but they want stability in the legislation of the country. This sliding scale is disadvantageous to them. You might increase the tax to a dollar on the 1st day of June, if you make no increase for a year thereafter, and for this very good reason: the manufacturer of the article makes his plans and arrangements this fall with a view to the carrying on of that manufacture for a year. During the progress of that time it is impossible for him to quit if he wished to do so. He may lose money every day in the manufacture; but still to stop is ruin.

But, sir, there is another subject being discussed here more important to him than the amount of the taxation upon the article to be manufactured; and that is, the proposition to levy a duty upon the stock on hand. I care not if that duty is but five cents a gallon, the effect upon him, if it is adopted, is disastrous in this: you assert the principle that you have the right to levy a second tax upon this article at any time; and if he has not capital enough in advance to carry on his year's operations he cannot enter upon the business; and why? He has to call upon capitalists to advance to him money to buy upon speculation; and people who have money in this country generally make money out of it. The man of capital will invest nothing in the purchase of whisky. Why? Because, when it is in his hands you may levy a tax hereafter of fifty cents or a dollar a gallon upon it and destroy the capital that he has invested in the article. The levying of a duty of five cents a gallon upon the stock on hand does the manufacturer more mischief than the levying of $1 50 upon the article to be manufactured.

In reference to the other subject that has been discussed here by Senators, I have only this to say: I imagine that, whether we manufacture whisky in the Northwest or not, it will have but little influence upon the price of the corn that the Government is compelled to have. Suppose you put corn in Iowa, Illinois, and Indiana down to ten cents a bushel; what effect will that have on the price on the seaboard? It is the transportation of the corn that so enhances the price when it reaches the sea-shore or any point where our armies are. The original price paid for it is a matter of very little importance. It is important that we should have distilleries there for the purpose of carrying some of it off, so that it may be disposed of in the shape of whisky. I repeat, however, that whether the manufacture of whisky is carried on or not, it has but little influence on the price of corn and forage to the Government, because the transportation is the great expense and not the cost of the corn itself.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, it is well known to the chairman of the Committee on Finance and the members of the old committee that I have always insisted that this particular article would bear a high rate of taxation. I was in favor of it when we adopted our first tax bill. I said then it would bear a tax of a dollar a gallon, and urged a higher rate of taxation. I am of the same opinion still. I think if we pass the bill as it now stands, and fix the tax at a dollar a gallon, that ultimately when the law comes into full operation and full application, the amount of production will be very little different from what it would be otherwise. Therefore, I say, I am in favor of deriving from this subject-matter as much revenue as possible. I would not object, and I do not think it would be unsound policy to raise the tax that we propose to assess, as soon as it can be applied, to $1 50 a gallon, and then again raise it at the end of a year, or at the proper time to make the change, to $2 a gallon; and I believe there would be as much whisky distilled as there would be with a less rate of taxation. It is one of those things that are produced or consumed without reference to price. It was observed by every person who has noticed anything about the consumption of brandies, for instance, that after the change of the tariff of 1846, raising the duty on brandies as delivered in our markets, there was no perceptible difference in consumption; and that has been the result of all observation and statistics with regard to the same kind of subject-matter.

But I agree with the Senators from Indiana and Illinois with regard to the objection to a regular ascending scale. The committee propose an increase of twenty-five cents at the end of certain periods named. The effect will be that between now and the 1st of October there will be a forced manufacture to avoid the twenty-five cents increase at that time; then between the 1st of October and the 1st of January there will be a forced manufacture to avoid the additional twenty-five cents at that time; and then between the 1st of January and the 1st of June there will be another forced production; whereas the same thing might be accomplished and be consistent with all these interests by fixing now a high rate of taxation. I would go for $1 25 or $1 50, and let it run through the season, and then put it up to $1 50 or $2. I would prefer myself to go for a tax of $1 50 now, and let this season's business be done with a tax of $1 50, and then in June, 1865, fixing it at $2, so as not to have this continual pressure and this forcing of the manufacture every three months between this time and June, 1865.

I do not think it wise policy. This forcing of the manufacturers from time to time forces these interests right against the interests of the country, for we need this material to a very large extent to maintain our armies in the field. There are many reasons why it is impolitic, independent of its interfering with the regular legitimate business of the manufacturers themselves. The same object can be accomplished, the same revenue derived, by simplifying the matter, by having one rule from this time until June, 1865, making the duty high enough; I would say myself $1 50.

As this subject is up now, I only throw out my views as other gentlemen are throwing out their views, but when the time comes for the proper amendment to be moved, I shall represent my opinion by my vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I dissent entirely with gentlemen in their proposition to lay one tax now and another a year from next June. It will be perceived that our object is to reach if possible the manufacture of the coming season, and to fix a time by our legislation, not in terms but substantially, when the whole tax will go into operation, that time to be as near as possible. What would be the effect of the proposition suggested by Senators? Suppose we fix the duty upon the 1st of June next at a dollar, as proposed by the honorable Senator from Indiana, and then let the next time fixed be the succeeding 1st of June after the season is over. The consequence would be simply this: during this season the distilleries would be run to their utmost extent, and a stock accumulated on hand against the rise in June which would prevent our receiving any benefit for a very long period. Our object is (and it is a very proper object in my judgment) to strike at the coming season, and the best mode of doing that was a question of consideration with the committee. It was a serious question with the committee (and that is for the Senate to decide) whether we would not put on the whole tax at once. I should be willing to go up to two dollars. I think the article would bear it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now; that is to say if we adopted that system; and if we adopt that system I would prefer to put on the two dollars now; but the objection to that would be, it being so very high it would stop production entirely during the next season if it was all put on at once, because there is stock on hand which perhaps might be sufficient to last over, and it might therefore have an injurious effect in that particular. We want some revenue out of it as fast as we can get it, and we want to secure substantially what is coming in the next season by way of production. We supposed, as I stated a few moments ago, that from June to October there would be little or nothing produced, and no great injury would accrue. When the fall crop comes in, the tax being raised to $1 25, there is a stimulus to production up to the 1st of January, when it will be raised again, and then after January, when it is raised, we have the balance of the year.

I think the objection that it is to operate injuriously with reference to the hogs, cattle, &c., is a mistaken idea. In the first place I do not attach as much consequence to the statements of distillers, however plausibly made, with reference to these things as I once did, not long ago. I find they have varied so fast in their opinions according to the necessities of the case that I have come to the conclusion we have given altogether too much confidence to their statements. Why, sir, when we first laid the tax of twenty cents on whisky, we were told by them that a tax of forty cents would ruin the business. No longer ago than last winter, when our committee-room was filled with the first distillers in the country, they told us that seventy-five cents, possibly eighty, was the highest that the article could possibly bear. My friend from Indiana now says the distillers in his section of the country tell him it will bear $1 or $1 25, but $1 50 is altogether too tough; they cannot stand that at all. In my judgment, it will bear a tax of $1 50 just as well as it will any other sum, for the simple reason that the article must be had; it must be produced; the appetites of the people require it; and inasmuch as it must be produced, and paid for when produced, it makes no difference what tax you put on it except so far as it affects other interests.

Mr. McDougall. I suggest, then, why it would not be as well to put on the $1 50 now, and then allow it to run through this season instead of changing it this year again.

Mr. Fessenden. I thought I answered that when I commenced my remarks. You may put on the $1 50 now. I said that if you undertake to impose the whole of the duty now I should be in favor of putting it up at once to $2, because perhaps a tax of $1 50 would produce the same effect if put on now, and there was not the stimulus that was afforded by a sliding scale. The object of the sliding scale was simply a stimulus to production through the season instead of at once putting on a duty which being so high might have the effect to induce them to let their distilleries lie comparatively idle and trust to the stock on hand to sustain them until they begin another season. We want money now—that is the simple reason. We want to get revenue out of this particular thing. It is a great source of revenue, and therefore we want it. There are only two questions to be considered: first, what will the article bear; and, in the next place, how shall we lay this duty so as to get money out of it immediately and money all along. The committee came to the conclusion, as we did before when we reported the sliding scale originally to the Senate at a much lower rate, that this was the best mode of accomplishing that purpose.

With reference to the objection the honorable Senator from Indiana makes, that it will operate injuriously upon them, they understand how to systematize their own business. He said they must keep their hogs and cattle all through, but if we stimulate the production so largely for three months it will not be so large afterwards, and therefore, not being so large, their business will not be profitable, and with reference to the particular things which they must keep. Sir, the control of the matter is all in their own hands. They all keep these hogs, they all keep these cattle, and they know how to manage their own business with reference to extending it through the whole season, and with reference to the sliding scale. They have ample notice of it. It is with them to increase their production largely or not. The men who carry on that business to a great extent—and some of them do to an enormous extent—can see how best to manage their own affairs to make it profitable through the whole season. If they only know what our legislation is in advance for the year, they can accommodate themselves to that legislation for the year, and save themselves from any loss. It is in their hands, and not in ours; and that I take to be a sufficient answer to the objection that was made by the honorable Senator on that particular point.

I hope the amendment of the committee will be adopted, and when we come into the Senate, if it becomes necessary to alter it on account of the action of the Senate with reference to the tax on whisky on hand, which I do not propose now to discuss any further, we can do so.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to inquire whether, if the amendment of the committee prevails, it will be in order to change that amendment when we come into the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so.

Mr. POMEROY. When we come into the Senate—and I think perhaps by that time this view of the subject may commend itself to Senators—I want to have a vote of the Senate on the proposition to tax all whisky manufactured after the date of the law at $1 50 per gallon. I want the distillers to have one season under that tax, and at the opening of the next season I want to put it at $2. My earliest recollections were in a distillery. I know something about this business. The first thing I can remember in this life was stirring the fire under a distillery. Though I am not connected with the business in any way so that I have the least interest in it, yet all my life long I have known something about it, and I believe it would bear the highest tax that has yet been named by any Senator. I said so a year ago. I tried then to obtain a vote of the Senate on a proposition to put a tax of one dollar a gallon upon it, but it was thought at that time that a tax of twenty cents would ruin everybody. I want a vote of the Senate to see if we cannot agree on a proposition providing that all whisky to be manufactured during the year shall pay a tax of $1 50, and all manufactured after the year, that is from June, 1865, $2; and you will find that will not interfere with the business at all.

Mr. Fessenden. I will not ask the Senator whether the result would not be to produce so large a quantity between now and June of next year that probably there would be none at all manufactured the next year, and consequently we should receive no revenue then.

Mr. POMEROY. Suppose the result is that they produce a large amount, this year. They pay $1 50 on it, and the increase beyond that is only fifty cents. We now increase the duty from sixty cents up to $1 50, an increase of ninety cents. All manufactured during this year will pay ninety cents a gallon over and above the sixty cents that is paid now, and all manufactured next year will pay only fifty cents over and above what is manufactured this year.

I think that proposition will produce the largest amount of whisky and the largest amount of revenue. That is what I am after. I have no sympathy with distillers. I am looking at this matter with a view to produce the largest amount of revenue, and at the same time not destroy the business. I desire to secure the largest possible amount of revenue, and I do not care how much whisky is produced if we get the tax of $1 50 a gallon.

I believe that this tax of $1 50 will suspend the distilleries for this year; but, as I have said before, that will help us in another direction. It will reduce the price of all the produce of the country; for the price of oats and all the forage for the Army is regulated more or less by the price of corn. When we have stopped distilling corn of course there will be no great demand for it; the Army will get it at lower prices; and if we do not get revenue in one direction the Government will get the benefit of it in another. I am in favor of imposing a tax of $1 50 on whisky from and after the passage of this act, and a tax of $2 the next year after that; and those two steps are all the steps I want to take in the matter: I will offer such an amendment in the Senate. I think that will be the best place to offer it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was going to offer an amendment now, but at the suggestion of Senators who agree with me in the principle involved in this matter, I will postpone it until the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. I am really gratified to see to what an extent the public confidence, and especially the confidence of the Senate, has increased in this article of whisky within the past two years. It is true, as the chairman of the committee has remarked, that when we first proposed to put a tax of twenty cents per gallon on the article the proposition was received with fear and trembling. It was asserted in many directions in and out of the Senate that it was too feeble; it would not stand any such tax. The proposition to increase that duty to sixty cents per gallon was resisted very strenuously for the same reason. I thought then if every Senator had understood the article as well as I did they would have more faith in it, as I had. I believed it would stand a higher duty then; I believe it will stand a higher duty now; and I am glad to see that even the Senator from Indiana has grown somewhat in grace and in the knowledge of this article since these discussions first commenced.

The only question now in dispute seems to be how we shall get up from this low rate of taxation, which really is injurious to the country and disgraceful to the article of whisky, to that higher rate of duty which the dignity of the article and the interests of the Treasury demand. Shall we go up at once now by a single enactment, or shall we go up by regular foreordained gradations; and if in the latter way, shall these steps be near together and with slight elevations, or shall they be far apart, extreme, radical?

The difficulty, it seems to me, in reaching this elevation by a single step, by a single enactment and now, is this: you are affecting the interests of two classes of men, distinct and with interests diverse, almost at war with each other, who are dealing in this article of whisky that you propose to tax; one class are the holders, the speculators, and the other the manufacturers. The manufacturer of spirits, like almost all other manufacturers, passes it out of his hand as he produces it. That is the rule. There are exceptions to it, because there are some manufacturers of spirits, as there are manufacturers of cotton, who are speculators in the article as well as makers of it. The rule is, they make to-day to sell as fast as the market will take it off their hands. The capitalists, the men with money, buy and hold for a better market. To-day the holders of this article have the largest quantity of it, perhaps, the country ever knew of at one time in their hands. If you put a tax of $1 25 or $1 50 or $2 a gallon on the article now, what do you say to the manufacturer? Simply this: You cannot start your distilleries again until you can afford to make whisky and to pay two dollars a gallon upon it and bring it into market and sell it in competition with these holders who have bought their whisky when it paid but sixty cents a gallon. When do you suppose he would start under those circumstances? Not for a good many months to come.

That is the difficulty, as I perceive, in putting up this duty at once to a very high rate; but I think you can increase it between this and the 1st of October, and I remarked when I was on the floor just now that I thought the increase should be made about the 1st of October or the 1st of November. I am not sure, upon reflection, but my own reasoning requires me to vote the increase at the present time; and I think that is the true policy, upon reflection. Whether you increase the tax or not the distillation will stop for a time for reasons that have before been spoken of; but you may raise the tax, and yet I think the influence of the new crop will enable the manufacturer (if you do not put on too high a duty) to start his distilleries when the new crop comes in, buy up his cattle and his hogs, and prepare for another year's operations.

But how high can you raise the duty and enable the distiller to do that in competition with the holder of this large stock? I am sure I do not know the precise figure. I would venture to vote an additional duty of twenty-five cents; but in view of all the testimony we have had on this subject during the past few months, I think an increase of twenty-five cents per gallon would be a radical measure. I think it is as high as you ought to go and expect these manufacturers will be able to resume their business when the next crop comes off. If Senators differ from me, and they think they can put on a higher rate of duty, I am entirely content that they shall do so. I cannot justify such a vote myself, and therefore I shall not give such a vote.

If we put it at a dollar, it would be an addition of forty cents. Suppose we put it at a dollar, is that the maximum? I do not believe it at all. Other Senators say that it will bear even a higher duty than that; but they say put it on now, or postpone what you do not put on now for a year to come. Mr. President, I do not want an increased duty put upon this article of whisky that you do not provide for when this law passes. I want you to sound yourselves in the examination of this bill, examine the testimony you have on the subject, and provide before this bill becomes a law for the very maximum that you intend to put upon this article. I want it provided for in this bill. I do not want the maximum duty to be imposed at once, but to be provided for in this law; for every time you change the law you produce just the state of things you have here to-day—rival interests, manufacturers who want an open market to sell in, and the holders of the whisky whom by your legislation you enable to foreclose the markets, to monopolize them for a time.

But it is said that the imposition of these graduated duties, this sliding scale, as it is called, makes the business of manufacturing uncertain, unsettled. I think those who assert this are entirely mistaken. Hitherto, when we have discussed the propriety of this sliding scale, I have never heard a distiller object to it. The distiller is not injured by it at all. The purchaser, the speculator loses an opportunity if you make the increase at short periods and in inconsiderable sums. If you raise the duty ten cents a month or five cents a week by a foreordained enactment, the distiller works upon it; he runs his distillery as it is ordinarily run; he settles with the collector under one law for one week's work or one month's work, and under another law for another; and his spirits come forward to market with just the difference in price marked upon them that he paid to the collector; and that is all there is of it.

But the speculator, if I may so speak, is played out, for he has no sort of inducement where the increase is only five cents or ten cents at a time to raise the capital and invest it in this article in order to enable him to monopolize the market against the distiller. When you allow him three months to accumulate in and propose to put up the duty twenty-five or forty cents at a time, that opens a field to bold and daring speculation. You have seen that field occupied two or three times already in the course of our legislation on this subject. It is occupied completely to-day. I never want to see it opened to them again after we have got through with this bill.

I therefore still adhere to the idea that I defended as well as I could all through the winter, and that I broached when I was on the floor before, that we should now make up our minds as to what should be the maximum of duty imposed upon this article, and we should incorporate it in this bill. Make the present rise as high as you think you can afford to go, and yet allow the manufacturer, under the influence of the new crop, to come in with his stock and divide the market with the holder of the stock now on hand, and thereafter go on in regular gradations, frequent and slight. Guided by these views, I think I shall ask for a division of the question upon the amendments in this section. I am arguing from a different point of view than the Senator from Ohio is. I want the policy of the Senate settled upon these questions before I am brought face to face with that other question, the question of taxing the stock on hand; for I say here that if you put the present duty upon this article so high as to give the holders of the stock now on hand a monopoly of the markets beyond the cutting of the new crop, I shall feel compelled, much as I dislike the principle, to vote for imposing a tax upon that stock on hand and try to get it. The principle of that taxation is utterly obnoxious to me; but necessity may possibly drive me even to more obnoxious measures than that. I want to be spared it, and therefore I do not want this duty put too high at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin desires a division of the question. The first question will be on the first amendment which is in line five of section fifty-four, to strike out "May" and insert "June."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose there is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment is in line seven to strike out the words "January, 1865," and insert "October, 1864."

Mr. HENDRICKS. If these amendments are now agreed to, will there be any difficulty when the bill comes into the Senate, on a question of order, in moving to strike out the whole and insert another grade of taxation?

Several SENATORS. Not at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There will be no difficulty as to the point of order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not see why we may not take a vote now and ascertain the sense of the Senate on these amendments.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The objection is that it takes two votes, for we shall have the matter all over again in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I state again, that if the action of the Senate may be considered as definite on these amendments, it will necessarily involve the discussion of the tax upon spirits on hand, which I have declined to discuss now, and I will state the reason. If we now raise so largely the duty on the article to be manufactured in the future, I think it is our duty to the Government, needing money, to put an equivalent tax upon the article on hand. The price of whisky to-day is $1 25 a gallon, or about equivalent to the cost of manufacture and $1 a gallon tax. The market has risen just about to the standard of the House bill. If the Senate propose now to increase the tax on the future manufacture of the article the article on hand will bear an equivalent tax. I therefore think, as a matter of policy, it is better to decide that question first, unless the Senate have made up their minds and look on it as a settled question. I know it has been decided two or three times, but there are considerations now that did not operate before. The proposed amendments of the Senate committee would increase the value of the article on hand to at least the amount of the House tax. Therefore I think that the question is presented in a very different form. The House proposed a tax of a dollar a gallon upon whisky. The market has risen to that standard. But our committee proposes to increase very largely the tax on the manufactured article. There will be scarcely any whisky manufactured between this and the 1st of January, none between this and the 1st of October, because there is no corn to be had, and the distilleries are generally stopped in the summer months, and they rarely commence again until the coming in of the new crop, so that the effect of the amendment we are now considering, if adopted, will be at once to raise the value of whisky on hand at least forty or fifty cents a gallon. It seems to me, therefore, you cannot consider this amendment without also considering the other branch of the subject. I hope that the Senate will just pass over this subject by adopting the amendments of the committee, and when they definitely consider the subject of the tax upon spirits on hand all this matter will be open in the Senate, and we can then perhaps agree to a different form of taxation. I shall then probably vote with the Senator from Indiana to fix a standard tax on whisky to continue during the year; but before I ascertain how much I am willing to vote as a tax on the future manufacture of the article I wish to have the views of the Senate definitely on the question whether they will tax the article on hand.

If the Senate determine that they will not tax the article on hand I think the rate fixed by the House of Representatives on the future manufacture is sufficient, and as much as can be reasonably levied. I do not believe you will get $50,000 for the coming fiscal year as the result of your tax on spirits manufactured in the future unless you put a tax upon the spirits on hand. Under the operation of section fifty-four the manufacture will entirely cease, I think, for one year. The stock on hand is now so large that I do not believe the distilleries will run during all the next winter at $1 50 a gallon. That is my judgment.

We have all been deceived in regard to the stock on hand from the very beginning of this controversy. We have never estimated it at one third the real amount. I have myself been deceived. We were told when the subject was first considered in the Senate that there was but sixty days' stock on hand; but the actual result showed that more than six months transpired before any was manufactured. Even when the tax was only twenty cents a gallon the stock on hand was equivalent to six months' supply. Nor was that all, because the old stock was not half exhausted before they commenced manufacturing at the twenty cents tax. I have seen various estimates made in regard to the stock on hand, ranging from forty to one hundred million gallons. The very highest amount that has ever been manufactured in this country in any one year is eighty millions; and I believe there is fully one year's stock on hand, though it is very difficult to arrive at that, because there is no exact basis of estimate; we cannot tell how much is stored away.

I again repeat, therefore, that unless the Senate wish prematurely to raise the question of the taxation of the stock on hand, and raise it in such a way that we cannot have a vote that will settle it, it is much wiser to let the whole matter go over until that question is settled, and then probably I shall agree with the Senator from Indiana in having a fixed standard tax on the value of whisky manufactured in the future.

If the Senate should refuse to put a tax upon spirits on hand then I am in favor of the House tax of one dollar a gallon without the gradation; but if the Senate is willing to put a tax of fifty cents a gallon upon whisky on hand, according to the House proposition, I am perfectly willing to raise the tax on the future manufacture to $1 50 a gallon; and it will not do injustice to anybody. It will not do injustice to a single operator, to a single man who has stock on hand, because the advance will at once be equivalent to the increased tax. That is the view I take of it. I do not desire to distress anybody engaged in this business. More people are engaged in the business of making whisky in the State of Ohio than in any other State of the Union. Her production was said to be, in 1860, forty per cent. of the whole. I believe next to the State of Ohio was the State of Illinois. Her production was larger than any other one State.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he believes that those holders who have bought whisky at $1 25 a gallon can pay forty cents additional tax without being injured?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do say that those who have bought it at $1 25 a gallon, in case we raise the duty on the future manufactured article to $1 50, can afford to pay fifty cents a gallon tax, for the price will at once advance to $1 75 a gallon.

Mr. HOWE. The proposition is only to charge a dollar to anybody.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I again repeat, the Senator must have understood me, that if a tax is put upon the article on hand, then I am in favor of increasing the tax on the future manufactured article from this time, from the passage of the act, to $1 50 a gallon, so as to make the matter equal. The effect will be to raise the price of whisky in the market to $1 75 a gallon; the holder would pay the increased value of fifty cents to the Government; the Government would derive that benefit; and then on the future manufactured article the Government would get the full amount of the revenue.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is one question that might as well be settled now as at any time, especially as the discussion has to some extent touched it. I agree with the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, that as to the rate of taxation, the vote may well be postponed until we reach the other question. I shall move so to amend this section as to present the question that I regard as one of great importance to this interest. It is to strike out of the original bill and the Senate amendments the dates wherever they occur after "the 1st day of June, 1864," and to insert in lieu thereof "the 1st day of June, 1865," so that the tax, whatever that is, shall remain for one entire year; and the Senate can as well decide that question now as at any time, for whether the tax be one dollar upon the gallon, or one dollar and a half upon the gallon, the question whether that tax ought to run during the whole year can as well be considered in the one case as in the other; the question is the same.

The Senator from Maine suggested this objection to my proposed amendment, that if we tax at the rate of one dollar a gallon from the 1st day of June, 1864, to the 1st day of June, 1865, and at that date increase the tax fifty per cent., the distilleries will be run to their utmost capacity through this entire year, and that then for the year following the Government will realize no revenue. I am surprised that the Senator suggested that argument, when his own proposition presents in three instances the same difficulty and objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not to that extent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Perhaps not to the same

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1st Session.

THURSDAY, MAY 26, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 153.

extent, but that is not important. The Senator has proposed in this bill that there shall be a tax of $1 on the gallon until the 1st of October, and from the 1st of October to the 1st of January $1 25 a gallon; and after the 1st of January $1 50 a gallon. Does it not suggest itself to the Senator's mind that it will be the interest of the distillers to run their distilleries to their utmost capacity up to the 1st day of October, and then not to produce so much until near the 1st day of January, and then for a while to produce all that it is possible to produce, with a view to the increased price, owing to the increased taxation?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will observe what my answer to that was: they cannot run their distilleries with profit from June to October, unless we omit to lay a further duty now and make the increase so great in October as to pay them for running them during that interval, when we have no hogs and no cattle; therefore I say that if we lay no increased duty now, and put it off till October, they would undoubtedly have the stimulus, but if we lay an increased duty now they would not have it, but would defer it till October. When October comes, what inducement have they to run to January? They are not obliged to sell. They would do precisely what they have done heretofore: they would say to themselves, "We will run our distilleries to January." Why? "Because by that time, although we shall then be obliged to pay an increased tax, we will make up for it by having our whisky manufactured in the mean time upon hand then, on which we will make a profit equal to the increased duty;" and that was the argument they advanced against the proposed tax upon liquor on hand. The distillers said, "If you lay this tax on liquor on hand you destroy us, for we cannot in the first place get the credit necessary; but if you leave us what we have got on hand, for us to make a profit on, we can offset one against the other, and sustain ourselves." I want to have the increased tax come precisely at that period of the year when they are in that condition that they must keep on from necessity. They have their stocks, and they cannot leave off on the 1st of January; they must keep on manufacturing. I am for legislating for the Government, and not for the distillers. While I do not want to hurt the distillers, I want to help the Government, and not lay the tax in such a way that the Government will fail to be benefited.

Mr. HENDRICKS. With great respect to the Senator I have to suggest to him that he is legislating to discourage the production of whisky alone, disconnected with the feeding of stock. The real interest of the distiller and of the country, in my judgment, is not to discourage his business, but to so act that the production of whisky and the feeding of stock may go together. I understand, although I am not very well informed on the subject, that the slops after the grain has passed through the still are worth nearly one half the original price of the grain, for the purpose of feeding cattle and hogs. Now the Senator proposes a tax of $1 a gallon from the 1st day of June until the 1st of October, and then of $1 25 to the 1st day of January, and after the 1st day of January $1 50, an increase of fifty per cent., so that the distiller can produce in the mean time his liquor without feeding stock, if he can hold the liquor until the 1st day of January, and make the same profit that he would make, if this increased tax did not take place, by distilling and feeding stock together. Certainly that is not the interest of the country, it is not the interest of the Government.

What I ask for this interest is that there shall be stability in the policy toward it. It is a very important interest to us in the Northwest now. Our market in the South, which was a very profitable one to us when we sent our corn down the rivers, is cut off; we must depend upon another market; and all Senators know very well that corn is so bulky and so heavy that it cannot with profit to the farmer find a market in that shape in the eastern ports. We must have a market somewhere. The production of whisky in the Northwest does furnish us to some extent a market for our immense production of corn, not alone by distilling it, but by feeding stock. The stock finds a market anywhere; there is no difficulty in that; and there is no difficulty in carrying our corn to a market after it is turned into whisky. But if you strike down this interest and compel us to send our corn to an eastern market, you to that extent destroy a very important interest in the Northwest.

Is it not a reasonable thing that we shall ask that a law which taxes an article on the 1st day of June, 1864, shall be the law touching that interest for one entire year? Is the Senator from Maine willing that any interest of New England shall be taxed for three months at one rate, and for three months thereafter at another rate, producing instability, disturbing the whole course of business? I do not know that this feature of legislation is applied in this bill to any interest except this of the Northwest; and I ask now of the Senate that they shall say that whatever the rate of taxation shall be, that rate shall continue for one entire year, during the course of one entire operating season. If the distiller commences to produce whisky out of the corn raised this year at a taxation of one dollar on the gallon, allow him to complete the entire year's operation at that same rate of taxation. It can be so adjusted as to be just to the distiller and profitable to the Government.

My proposition then, Mr. President, is that the rate, whatever it shall be, shall remain the same for one year; and then at the end of that year, if it is the pleasure of the Senate to increase it, it may be done without serious detriment to the interest. We can meet this question now as well as at any time during the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. Does the Senator fix any rate?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir. The rate fixed by the House of Representatives is in the bill, of course; but my amendment does not propose to touch that question, but simply provides that the rate which may be fixed shall continue for one entire year; and with a view to this question, it is not important whether the rate be $1, $1 25, or $1 50. Whatever the rate is, let it stand for a year; let this interest know that there is some stability in the legislation. The Senate legislates for a few months with a view to revenue, and with a view to speculation. Senators complain that at the end of a particular period the tax is increased and then there is speculation by the holder. A void that by giving some permanency to the policy that shall be adopted; let the same tax run through a year, and you cut off this speculation of which Senators complain. It is just to the distiller, and it is not injurious to the Government. The amendment which I propose is to strike out the dates after "1864," in the sixth line, and to insert "the 1st day of June, 1865."

Mr. GRIMES. If that amendment should be adopted by the Senate, as I understand, it would cause the tax to be $1 until the 1st of June, 1865. If the Senator from Indiana would change his proposition so as to make the tax $1 50 at this time, and from this time forward, I am inclined to think that I should vote for it; but I should think that $1, after the Senator himself has admitted on the floor of the Senate this morning that whisky will stand a tax of $1 25, would be rather too small an amount to put on it at this time, when we are taxing every other article as high as it will possibly bear.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I cannot propose what the Senator from Iowa suggests. I cannot propose a tax upon a production of my own section of the country which I do not think is right. I think $1 50 is an oppressive tax. It is not proportionate to the taxation proposed upon other interests of the country. I think that $1 is a high tax. Nor did I say that the interest would well bear a taxation of $1 25. I said this, however: that it were better for the interest that the tax should be $1 25, and that that tax should run throughout the whole year, than that you should commence with $1, run up in a few months to $1 25, and in a few months afterwards to $1 50; that instability, that change of the rate of taxation, stimulated the production for a while, and then taking away the stimulant, encouraging speculation, is an injury to the interest instead of a benefit. We had better have a high tax at once and let it run through the whole year than to have a low taxation for a while and then a higher rate of taxation. I am of the opinion that one dollar on the gallon, as is fixed by the House of Representatives, is a very high rate; but I do not propose, in connection with this particular question, to consider what shall be the rate. If the Senator from Iowa thinks $1 25 ought to be the rate for the year, he can propose it; but does he not believe it to be a right principle of legislation that the rate fixed shall continue for one entire year, during one entire producing season? Is not that a right principle? If so, let him stand up to it without reference to the rate of taxation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the committee will be reported, so that it will be understood.

The SECRETARY. The amendment to the amendment is to strike out the dates after "1864," in the sixth line of section fifty-four, and to insert "the first day of June, 1865;" so that the section will read:

On all spirits that may be distilled and sold, or distilled and removed for consumption or sale, of first proof, on and after the 1st day of June, 1864, and prior to the 1st day of June, 1865, a duty of $1 on each and every gallon; on and after the 1st day of June, 1865, and prior to the 1st day of January, 1866, a duty of $1 25 on each and every gallon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is not right. The amendments of the committee have been divided.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Secretary has not quite fully conceived the amendment which I have proposed. I will read the section as I think it will stand if my amendment be adopted:

On and after the 1st day of June, 1864, and prior to the 1st day of June, 1865, $1 on each and every gallon; and on and after the 1st day of June, 1865, $1 50 on each and every gallon.

That will be the language of the section if my amendment be adopted; and I desire to say again that the rate of taxation will be within the control of the Senate after this particular proposition is considered.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I desire to say that I was a member of the Committee on Finance during the last Congress when our first bill was pending, and I was the first person that urged on the committee an ascending scale like this, and I proposed then that we should ascend from the minimum to a very heavy maximum. The chairman of the Committee on Finance at that time, however, and some members of the committee, urged such potent reasons that it was against the policy of the bill to adopt such an ascending scale, that it would interfere with the general course of business as well as afford a stimulant that was not a healthy one, and interfere with the course of trade, and disturb the whole business as a matter of commerce as well as a matter of production; that I abandoned the proposition. I think the gentlemen have changed their opinions since then. They then convinced me that these continuous changes by an ascending scale were unwise. I became satisfied of that fact, and I have remained up to this time of the same conviction which they then impressed upon me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the Senate at present will adopt the amendments of the committee. I feel the force of what has been said by the Senator from Ohio in reference to the tax upon the stock on hand. I shall be controlled in all probability by the decision of the Senate on that subject in my vote on this particular section finally; but I shall vote now to sustain the committee amendments to the House bill, not that I desire at present to say that in the end I will do so; I may vote with the Senator from Indiana ultimately; but I think it will be a great deal better to adopt the amendments at present. Doing so will not interfere with our regulating this section as we may desire when we come into the Senate. I think this is not the proper time to settle the question, and we are merely losing time by undertaking to settle it now. Unquestionably whatever we may determine now on this point will be unsettled after we settle the other question alluded to by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If that is the view of a Senator representing a western State, and who, I suppose, sympathizes with the interests of that section, and if, at this time, we are likely to lose his vote on what I think a very important question, I will, with the permission of the Senate, withdraw my amendment, and let the matter take the course that was suggested some time ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's amendment can be withdrawn only by unanimous consent, as the yeas and nays have been ordered upon it. Is there any objection to its being withdrawn? The Chair hears none. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn, and the question now recurs on the amendment of the committee. The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next branch of the amendment is in line nine of section fifty-four, to strike out "January 1, 1865," and insert "October 1, 1864, and prior to the 1st day of January, 1865."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "gallon," in line twelve of section fifty-four, to insert:

On and after the 1st day of January, 1865, a duty of $1 50 on each and every gallon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section fifty-five, before the word "in," in line eight, to strike out "that," and after the word "in" to strike out "reducing the temperatures to the standard of sixty, and in;" in line ten, to strike out "table of commercial values" and insert "tables;" in line sixteen, to strike out "and" and insert "until otherwise ordered by;" after "Treasury," in line sixteen, to insert "who;" and after "regulations," in line eighteen, to strike out "not inconsistent but corresponding with the standard and value hereinbefore indicated;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 55. And be it further enacted, That the term first proof used in this act and in the laws of the United States shall be construed and is hereby declared to mean that proof of a liquor which corresponds to fifty degrees of Traill's centesimal hydrometer, adopted by regulation of the Treasury Department, of August 13, 1850, at the temperature of sixty degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer. And in levying duties on liquors above and below proof, the tables contained in the manual for inspectors of spirits, prepared by Professor McCulloch, under the superintendence of Professor Baché, and adopted by the Treasury Department, shall be used and taken as giving the proportions of absolute alcohol in the liquids gauged and proved according to which duties shall be levied until otherwise ordered by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized to adopt such hydrometers and prescribe such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to insure a uniform system of inspection and gauging of spirits subject to duties throughout the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seven of section fifty-six, after the words "shall use" to strike out "or intend to use."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten of section fifty-six, after the word "kept" to strike out "by him;" and in line eleven, after the word "distilled" to strike out "by him."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eighteen of section fifty-six, after the word "first" to strike out "tenth" and insert "eleventh," and in line nineteen to strike out "twentieth" and insert "twenty-first," and in line twenty to strike out "a general" and insert "an;" so as to read:

And shall render to said assessor or assistant assessor, on the 1st, 11th, and 21st days of each and every month in each year, or within five days thereafter, an account in duplicate, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-three of section fifty-six, before the word "accounts" to strike out "general."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines thirty-seven and thirty-eight of section fifty-six, after the word "duly" to strike out "certified to by the assessor or assistant assessor" and insert "verified as aforesaid."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was at the end of section fifty-six to add the following clause:

And provided further, That brandy distilled from grapes shall pay a tax of twenty-five cents per gallon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We intend in all cases to change "tenth" and "twentieth" to "eleventh" and "twenty-first." I notice one place in section fifty-six, the proviso on page 62, where the change is not reported. It is not particularly material there perhaps; but I move to strike out "tenth" and "twentieth" and insert "eleventh" and "twenty-first," so as to compare with the other provisions of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section fifty-seven, line two, to strike out after the word "every" the word "assessment" and insert "collection;" so as to read:

There shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury in every collection district where the same may be necessary, one or more inspectors of spirits, refined coal oil or other oil, tobacco, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten of the same section after the word "inspected" to strike out "or," and after "gauged" to insert "or proved."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section fifty-eight, line eleven, after "distiller" to insert "to the collector, and a duplicate thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section fifty-eight, line thirteen, after the word "be" to strike out "assessed and;" so as to read:

And the duty imposed by law shall be paid on all spirits, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out after the word "warehouse," in line fourteen of section fifty-eight, the words "and the fees of such inspector shall in all cases be paid by the owner of the spirits so inspected, gauged, and proved."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have been conversing with different members of the Senate who think that on the whole it would be as well, perhaps, while this bill is under consideration—at any rate we can try the experiment—to hold evening sessions. A large portion of it is mere reading, and if we can get a couple of hours in the evening we shall get over a good deal of space. The session is getting to be late; and if we sit only in the day time for bills of this kind, it will be no very easy matter to judge when we shall get through. I therefore move that at half past four o'clock this afternoon the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. May I not suggest to the Senator whether on the whole it would not be better to begin to-morrow, and merely give notice now?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. Senators may have engagements for this evening, not knowing that it was proposed to hold an evening session. I happen to have made an engagement for this evening; but of course I must abandon it if it be necessary for me to be here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If Senators prefer, I will content myself now with giving notice that to-morrow I shall move to take a recess from half past four until seven o'clock.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suggest to the Senator to begin the recess at four o'clock instead of half past four.

Mr. FESSENDEN. From half past four to seven gives two hours and a half, which I think is enough.

Mr. RAMSEY. But I propose to take a recess at four and commence again at six.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the objection to beginning to-day?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The objection is that some members of the Senate, not having anticipated it, have made engagements for this evening, who would prefer to be here while the bill is being considered. I therefore give notice that I shall make the motion to-morrow; but if gentlemen insist upon it I am willing to make it to-day. Perhaps, however, it is better to give a day's notice; and I now give notice that to-morrow I shall ask that the Senate take a recess from half past four to seven o'clock.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The motion may as well be made to-day, to take effect to-morrow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The motion can be made to-morrow.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section fifty-nine, line three, after the word "warehouse" to strike out "of iron, stone, or brick, with metal or other fire-proof roof, and such warehouse," and to insert "established in conformity with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe;" so that the clause will read:

That the owner or owners of any distillery or oil refinery may provide, at his or their own expense, a warehouse established in conformity with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section sixty and to insert a substitute for it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a very long section. The Senate can do as it pleases about having it read. I will simply state that the new section which is drafted instead of it is drafted with a view to put the same provisions in a shorter and more compact and more intelligent compass, and it has been very carefully examined.

Mr. GRIMES. Read the amendment only.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER.) Unless some Senator requests it, the reading of the sixtieth section of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives will be dispensed with, and only the amendment proposed in lieu of it will be read.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be inserted in lieu of the sixtieth section of the House bill, as follows:

That all distilled spirits and all refined coal oil and naphtha, upon which an excise duty is imposed by law, may, after being inspected, gauged, proved, and marked by the inspector according to the provisions of this act, be removed, without payment of the duty, under such rules and regulations, and upon the execution of such transportation bonds or other security as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. The said spirits, oil, or naphtha so removed shall be transferred directly from the distillery or refinery to a bonded warehouse established in conformity with law and Treasury regulations, and may be transported from such warehouse to any other bonded warehouse used for the storage of distilled spirits, coal oil, or naphtha. And after the arrival of such distilled spirits, coal oil, or naphtha at the bonded warehouses within the district of the assessor to which it has been transferred, it shall be again inspected, and the duty shall be assessed and paid on any deficiency or reduction of the number of proof gallons beyond such allowance for leakage as may be established by the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, received at the warehouse, from the number of proof gallons as stated in the bond given at the place of shipment. And any distilled spirits, coal oil, or naphtha in the public warehouses shall be subject to the same rules and regulations, and be chargeable with the same costs and expenses in all respects to which imported goods deposited in public store or bonded warehouse may be subject; and shall be in charge of a proper officer to be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, who, with the owner and proprietor of the warehouse, shall have the joint custody of all the distilled spirits, oil, or naphtha so stored in said warehouse, which shall be at the risk of the owner of the said spirits, oil, or naphtha. And all labor on the same shall be performed by the owner or proprietor of the warehouse, under the supervision of the officer in charge of the same, and at the expense of said owner or proprietor of the warehouse. And no drawback shall in any case be allowed on any distilled spirits, coal oil, or naphtha upon which an excise duty shall have been paid, either before or after it shall have been placed in a bonded warehouse: Provided, That any distilled spirits, coal oil, or naphtha may be withdrawn from the bonded warehouse after payment to the collector of the duty imposed by law, or may be removed without payment of the duty for the purpose of being exported, or for the purpose of being redistilled for export, after the quantity and proof of the spirits, oil, or naphtha to be removed has been ascertained and inspected according to the provisions of law, under such rules and regulations and the execution of such bond or other security as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. And any spirits, oil, or naphtha so removed for distillation shall be returned to the warehouse and shall be again inspected and the duty shall be paid to the said collector or any deficiency or reduction beyond the allowance for loss by redistillation established by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in the number of proof gallons received at the warehouse for the purpose of being exported as aforesaid. And nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the manufacture for exportation, without payment of duty, of medicines, preparations, compositions, perfumery, cosmetics, cordials, and other liquors manufactured wholly or in part of domestic spirits, as provided for in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section sixty-one, after the word "entries," in line one, to insert "required to be;" in line two, after the word "distiller" to strike out "required to be kept in the foregoing section" and to insert "as aforesaid;" in line four, after the word "first" to strike out "tenth" and insert "eleventh," and to strike out "twentieth" and insert "twenty-first;" and in lines six and seven to strike out the words "to be taken as aforesaid," so that the clause will read:

That the entries required to be made in the books of the distiller, as aforesaid, shall, on the 1st, 11th, and 21st days of each and every month, or within five days thereafter, be verified by oath or affirmation, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten, after the words "assistant assessor" to insert "or officer."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line four, section sixty-three, after the word "dollar" to insert "and fifty cents;" so as to read:

That there shall be paid on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquors, by whatever name such liquors may be called, a duty of $1 50 for each and every barrel containing not more than thirty-one gallons, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is with a good deal of regret that I oppose an amendment increasing the tax on anything, because I am in favor of the highest rate of taxation; but I have examined this subject of the tax on beer, and I am satisfied that the article will not bear the proposed increased tax. In the first tax bill of 1862 we levied a tax of one dollar per barrel upon beer. It was found to operate very severely, and the next year it was decreased to sixty cents a barrel. The House of Representatives have now proposed to raise the tax to one dollar a barrel, the same rate fixed by the law of 1862. The Senate committee propose to increase it fifty cents, so as to make the tax $1 50 a barrel. I believe I assented to that; but I am satisfied on examination that the article will not bear it.

I have before me a memorial signed by a committee of brewers from different portions of the country, in which they set out the tax in other countries on beer and malt liquors. I have also before me a table by which I have verified the statements made by this committee. The highest rate of taxation levied on malt liquors in any other country on earth is sixty-three and three fourth cents per barrel of thirty-one gallons American beer, which is the tax in England.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How much do they put on malt?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have looked to that. The tax on malt is two shillings and seven pence per bushel. In this memorial it is correctly computed. The rate on malt and hops is equivalent to sixty-three and three fourth cents a barrel of thirty-one gallons American beer.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do they not tax the beer?

Mr. SHERMAN. They do not tax the beer. They tax the malt and the hops. They tax malt two shillings and seven pence per bushel of forty-three pounds, and they impose a tax of two shillings on a bushel of hops. The aggregate of the tax, when computed, amounts to what I have said, sixty-three and three fourth cents per barrel of thirty-one gallons American beer. It seems there is a difference in the weight of our malt and the weight of the English malt. The tax in Prussia amounts to twenty-three cents per barrel of thirty-one gallons of beer.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is it on spirits?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know what the tax on spirits in Prussia is. In England the tax on spirits is ten shillings a gallon. The tax in England on a gallon of whisky is $2 or $2 20, if you call the shilling twenty-two cents, and it is really worth twenty-four cents by the difference in exchange, so that the rate of taxation proposed to be levied by this bill without the amendment on malt liquor is one and two third times the English tax, while our rate on spirits, even if we adopt the highest sum here proposed, is only a little over one half the English tax.

It struck me from the reading of this memorial, which I think states the case very fairly and frankly, that the article will not bear a higher rate than that proposed by the House of Representatives, which is one dollar a barrel, or a little over three cents a gallon. That is the concurrent testimony of these people. It is an interest which we ought not to sacrifice. It ought to pay of course as much as we can possibly levy from it; but as it takes but a comparatively few number of drinks of beer to make a gallon the tax on the drink is really much heavier in the case of beer than in the case of spirits.

I do not know that I can add anything to what is said by these people in their memorial. If Senators desire any further explanation on the subject I should like to have the memorial read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The committee are not very strenuous in respect to this tax; they had some doubt about it themselves; but they recollected certain facts. When we passed the tax bill two years ago we put a duty of twenty cents a gallon on spirits, and one dollar a barrel on beer. The objection made at that time by the manufacturers of beer was that the discrimination was not sufficient; that really the tax on beer at one dollar a barrel was too high in proportion to the tax on spirits at twenty cents a gallon. What was objected to was the proportion, and they said that if the tax on beer could be reduced to sixty cents a barrel it would make a proper proportion between the two, and they could get along. We reduced it to sixty cents a barrel. We are now raising spirits to $1 50, or, if you please to take the lowest rate, $1 a gallon from twenty cents, a five-fold increase. If we raise the tax on beer from sixty cents to $1 50 a barrel the proportion between the two will then be, compared with what it was before, altogether in favor of the manufacturer of beer, so that we do not possibly do any justice in that particular.

I am aware of the fact that the discrimination in England is what has been stated in the memorial; I have cast my eye over the memorial. It is stated there that it was found that when the rate upon beer was raised it very largely diminished the consumption, whereas raising the rate on spirits did not decrease the consumption but it kept on as before. We shall not gain much by increasing the duty on beer, if we thereby largely decrease the consumption; and that is stated to be, and I presume correctly stated to be, the reason why the British Government finally came back to their original position with regard to beer.

It is a question involving considerable difficulty. We thought on the whole that the matter required further discussion between the two Houses; and inasmuch as the other House put it at one dollar, if we agreed to that rate it would end the matter and it would no longer be open. As we thought it would require more discussion and examination, we deemed it better to change the rate somewhat; and then finally in a committee of conference, with all the advantages to be derived from the information afforded to both committees on the subject, the question can be settled. I would prefer, therefore, that the amendment should be adopted now, although I do not know that on more full examination I should be in favor of changing the rate fixed in the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is only one third of a cent on a glass.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is very small. The tax of $1 50 a barrel compared with the rate proposed on whisky is nothing to be compared to the ratio which before existed between the two. It was sixty cents tax on a barrel of beer and twenty cents on a gallon of whisky. Now we propose to put $1, and in a very short time $1 50, a gallon on whisky, and $1 a gallon on beer, to raise beer once and a half while we raise whisky four or perhaps six times. I prefer to have this amendment adopted, in order that the question may still be open to both Houses.

Mr. GRIMES. I believe it is admitted on all hands, and I think the chairman of the Committee on Finance admitted it to-day, that the tax that we put upon whisky, if it had any tendency at all, would be rather to increase its production.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I say it would not diminish it.

Mr. GRIMES. It will not diminish it at any rate. I should like to know if he can inform the Senate whether the tax on beer has had the same effect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is stated in the memorial that it diminished the consumption very largely.

Mr. GRIMES. That corresponds with the information I have derived from the brewers in the town in which I live, and generally in the State of which I am a citizen. They say that the effect of the law we passed before, although it was a small tax, as the Senator says it was, and as we all know it was, had the effect then, at sixty cents a gallon, to reduce the production of beer a great deal, especially of lager beer, that some portion of my constituents' indulge in; and I fear that their representations are true in regard to the probable effect of this increase of tax, and that the result will be that we shall drive our people from a very harmless beverage to a very destructive one, whisky; and I prefer to have an opportunity to vote on this in some shape or other.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If it produces that one effect it will be to the advantage of the country, because the tax being very much higher on whisky, we shall get more money out of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIMES. It may be to the advantage of the revenue but to the destruction of human life; and while we are legislating for the Treasury we ought to legislate for the people.

Mr. HARRIS. I entered upon the consideration of this bill with this principle before me as my guide: that I would vote for the highest tax upon everything; and I do not propose to depart very seriously from that rule now. I thought the tax of $1 50 a barrel on beer would bring to the Government more money than a tax of a dollar, I would vote for it. My own knowledge on the subject (because I suppose the town in which I reside manufactures more beer than any other town in the United States) is such as to lead me to the conclusion that a tax of $1 will give the Government more money than a tax of $1 50. I understand, indeed it is stated in this circular to which reference has been made, that now it costs the manufacturer of beer somewhat over two dollars a barrel more than it formerly did to manufacture the article, while he can get from his customers not more than $1 or at most $1 25 a barrel more, so that this increase of the expense of manufacturing falls on the manufacturer and not on the consumer, to a very great extent. Its effect has been to close up a great many little manufacturing establishments. And there are others who inform me that they would be very glad to get out of it were it not for the fact that they have so much capital engaged in the business that they cannot readily engage in any other pursuit. My own apprehension is that if we impose a tax of $1 50 a barrel on beer—an article that cannot be accumulated like whisky and kept on hand year after year; which must be consumed, as this circular says, like bread; it cannot be kept long; where the manufacturer must find his customers as the baker his—it will greatly diminish, as experience has shown it did in England, the manufacture and consumption of the article. I think it will stand a dollar; and if I believed it would bear more, I would vote for it as I will in every case. My own impression, and a very decided impression it is, too, is that a dollar is as much as the article will bear.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask Senators if they will not consent to make some change by increasing it somewhat, in order to leave the matter open for further examination. I am hardly prepared to close it now. Suppose they propose to put the tax at $1 25?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not object to letting the question go over. My action is based on conversations with men engaged in this business and on the memorial.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the facts are as they are stated, I am perfectly willing to yield, for my only object is to get as much money as possible for the Government consistently with justice. If this increase is to have the effect that is supposed, I prefer to let the bill remain as it is in this respect; but it struck the committee on examination that it was hardly satisfactorily shown that when we increased the duties on spirits so largely beer would not bear the increase here proposed. I would rather leave the matter open for consideration by the conference committee than to close it now by rejecting our amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "fifty" and inserting "twenty-five," so as to make the tax $1 25 a barrel.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was to insert in section sixty-three, line twenty-eight, after the word "liquors" the words "in bottles;" in line twenty-nine, after "dollar" to insert "and fifty cents;" and after "thirty" to insert "one;" so as to read:

Provided further, That beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquors in bottles, shall be assessed, according to the quantity contained therein, at the rate of $1.50 for thirty-one gallons.

The provisions of this section shall not apply to judicial or executive officers making auction sales by virtue of any judgment or decree of any court, nor public sales made by executors and administrators.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten of section seventy-seven, to strike out "or" and insert "on."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know that it is in order to propose an amendment, but I rise for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Finance what construction the committee put upon the proviso in the seventy-seventh section. I suppose that except so far as express power is given to the United States to do so, if it exists in any case, we cannot authorize business to be done in the States. The question what business is to be carried on is one exclusively for the States. Now this proviso as I read it would seem to imply that a business might be carried on in a State not only without the consent but against the laws of the State. The language is:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held or construed so as to prevent the several States, within the limits thereof, from placing a duty, tax, or license, for State purposes, on any business, matter, or thing on which a duty, tax, or license is required to be paid by law.

And then the portion to which I call attention is:

Nor shall any law of any State or Territory prohibiting any trade, business, or profession, be held to exempt or excuse any person following or being engaged in any such trade, business, or profession, from the payment of the license tax herein required.

I suppose the true construction of that would be, if there is authority in Congress to give the power, that the license would authorize a particular business or profession to be carried on against the laws of the State. I do not think that can be the view of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can tell the Senator that the laws of nearly all the States prohibit the sale of lottery tickets; and yet that business is openly carried on; the law is not enforced. Under the existing law the United States license does not allow the person holding it to carry on any business prohibited by the State law, does not justify it. It would be no defense to a prosecution in a State court to show that a man is licensed by the United States to do that thing.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the very difficulty. Then what is the meaning of the clause? The particular business referred to by the honorable member illustrates the view that I suppose is the correct view. Over the subject of lotteries the States have exclusive control. The United States have no authority to authorize a lottery in a State. It was doubted very much by the Supreme Court whether they had authority to authorize a lottery even here in this District; but certainly it was not doubted by them that they had no right to authorize a lottery established here to sell tickets in a State against the laws of the State. The first part of the proviso says that the States are notwithstanding this law to have a right to place a duty, &c., "on any business, matter, or thing on which a duty, tax, or license is required to be paid by law," but it goes on further to say:

Nor shall any law of any State or Territory prohibiting any trade, business, or profession be held to exempt or excuse any person following or being engaged in any such trade, business, or profession from the payment of the license tax herein required.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator overlooks the principal proposition in the section. The proposition of the section is this:

That no license heretofore provided for, if granted, shall be construed to authorize the commencement or continuation of any trade, business, or profession therein mentioned within any State or Territory of the United States in which it is, or shall be, specially prohibited by the laws thereof, or in violation of the laws of any State or Territory.

That is, the license granted by the laws of the United States shall not allow the citizens of any State to conduct any business within that State that is prohibited by the laws of the State. Then the next proviso is that the exercise of the taxing power by Congress shall not be exclusive, but that the State may exercise the taxing power also. The next is that if, notwithstanding the prohibition by the State of this employment within the State, it is openly exercised in the State, that shall not be a reason for not taking out a license. Perhaps the second clause of the proviso is unnecessary, but I do not know that it is when you consider that the laws of nearly all the States prohibit lotteries, and yet lottery tickets are sold in nearly all the States. That is the reason of it. It is in the old law, I think.

Mr. GRIMES. This is an exact transcript of the law as it stands, and I will put a case that has occurred in the town in which I live. We have a State law there prohibiting the selling of liquor; yet, unfortunately for the community, we make and drink and sell liquor. A year ago, upon the idea that they could avail themselves of the construction that the Senator from Maryland has given to this clause, those holding licenses from the United States went on to sell liquor, and there have been upwards of one hundred of them indicted, tried, and convicted, and it was held by our court that they could properly be convicted.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should convict them, too, if it was before me as a court, but it would only be on the ground that Congress had no authority to insert such a proviso as this. Assuming that Congress has the power, if they say a bare license shall give an authority to violate the laws of a State, then it certainly would be a defense against the laws of the State. If this section means anything, it means that. It says that if a man attempts to carry on any business prohibited by the laws of a State he shall take out a license; and I suppose if he is licensed to carry on the business from Congress, and Congress has the authority to grant the license, that is a protection against any of the laws of a State.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We provide that it shall not be.

Mr. JOHNSON. You provide that it shall not be a defense, and you provide that he shall not be exempted from taking out a license.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We provide in the first place that it shall be no defense for a violation of the laws of the State, and in the next place that it shall not have the effect to authorize any business to be carried on without a license, on the ground that it is prohibited by State law.

Mr. JOHNSON. That I understand. Now, I submit to the Senator if a State has the authority to prohibit the trade, is it right to authorize a license to be taken out under this law to carry on that very prohibited trade? That is the difficulty I have.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This question was discussed two years ago, and we came to the conclusion that this was the only mode we could adopt in order to protect the revenue. We say to every man who applies for a license, "We will give you a license, so far as that is concerned; but by the law the license is subject to State regulation; it does not authorize you to break the laws of the State." That is expressly provided for. He proceeds therefore at his own risk. Such a provision has been found to be very necessary.

Mr. TEN EYCK. In my opinion the point raised by the Senator from Maryland is a good one. I think the last portion of this section is inconsistent with the first part. Allusion has been made to the law, and it is said that this provision is the same as that contained in the law of two years ago on the subject of these licenses. Questions have already arisen under it in two of the States in this Union I know, where suits have been commenced against persons selling lottery tickets. It has been held by the United States courts in both those States that the act of Congress did not give them a license to sell lottery tickets, where the law of the State prevented it. Such has been the decision in the district court in the State of New York, and was also held in another State, as I understand. The question was brought up on appeal and is pending before the Supreme Court of the United States at this time, the officers here holding that the act of Congress passed two years ago did authorize the issuing of a license for the purpose of selling lottery tickets even in the States where they were prohibited by law.

I take it that the first portion of this section would prevent that business, according to an ordinary and proper construction; but the latter portion of the section might negative the first portion. I think the one is inconsistent with the other. The latter part of the section referred to by the Senator from Maryland might with great propriety be stricken out; and then this business which is sought to be licensed contrary to the laws of the States would be entirely put an end to. I do not want a contradiction to appear upon the face of the same section in relation to this grant of power, in the one instance preventing the States in the exercise of it, and in another instance allowing it; but this section as it stands admits that kind of construction. I will not take up time by reading the section over again, because it has been read on two different occasions; but I think that will be the construction that must be put upon it by those who critically examine it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not satisfied that the section goes quite far enough, on looking at it more critically. I suppose it was the intention of its framers—it certainly was my understanding—to provide here that the granting of a license under this act should not be held to exempt any man from the penalties that might be inflicted by any State for carrying on that particular part of the business, or to authorize him to carry it on against the law of the State. I do not find that that is in the section.

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir, it is not there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it ought to be there, especially with regard to the sale of liquors; and that section will need a little closer examination. I find on looking further that with regard to wholesale dealers in liquors and retail dealers in liquors the same provision, which I supposed was in there, is not in. It will take me a little time to look over it specifically, so as to prepare the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I certainly have no objection to the chairman taking time to do that; but I submit to the chairman of the committee that the suggestion he made that these licenses are to be taken at the hazard of the man taking the license—I do not mean to say that he is protected against State legislation—would appear in its real colors if the provision was found in the first part of the section. How would it appear if the section was written in this way:

That no license—

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the first part of the section is the very provision that I spoke of. It escaped my attention in looking it over.

Mr. JOHNSON. It reads in this way:

That no license herebefore provided for, if granted, shall be construed to authorize the commencement or continuation of any trade, business, or profession therein mentioned, within any State or Territory of the United States in which it is, or shall be, specially prohibited by the laws thereof, or in violation of the laws of any State or Territory—

But we will grant you a license. I am sure the Senator did not intend that; but that is virtually what is done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is precisely what we intended there. We say, "If you choose to take out a license you can pay for it and take it out, but you take it out on your peril and proceed on your peril so far as the laws of the State are concerned. So far as we are concerned, we give you the license."

Mr. JOHNSON. With all possible respect for the better judgment of the chairman of the committee and the Committee on Finance, I will move to strike out all that part of the section beginning in the eleventh line after the word "law." I do not ask a vote upon it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the reading of the bill will proceed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know why the amendment should be laid over. Attention is called to it now, and it seems to me we had better dispose of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It may as well be acted upon at once.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think that clause ought to be stricken out. It looks to me precisely in this way: as if it was an attempt by Congress to license a trade prohibited by a State.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly, that is the way I understand it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What will be the result? This matter was very fully discussed two years ago. Gentlemen do not understand it, unless they mean to establish a principle that may affect the revenue considerably in many of the States. For instance, take the Maine law as it exists in my State as an illustration. We prohibit the sale of liquors entirely, except by apothecaries for medicinal purposes; but, although we prohibit it and make seizures and destroy the liquor, it has been found practically that you cannot enforce it, especially in large towns.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to inquire if this bill does not provide for just that case by imposing a penalty where a man sells liquor without a license? Can you not collect your penalty under that provision?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Undoubtedly you can; but it makes another set of officers; that is to say, it makes it the duty of another set of officers to watch these very men. We say to them, "If you proceed to sell liquor without a license you shall be subject to such and such a penalty;" and those penalties are very severe. It has been found in practice that men who did not fear the State law, who would risk it, so far as the State was concerned, were not willing to risk the additional penalties under the United States, and consequently a revenue to a certain extent was obtained. The sale of liquor, for instance, is prohibited in some States and not in others, and unless you insert this provision the result will be these men will take their risk under State law and go on and sell; and we shall get no license fee from them. There is no harm in it. If they will go on to sell liquor in violation of the State law we put another penalty upon them. We say to them, "Sell it if you dare without a license from us."

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator will permit me, in one sense there is no harm. You can get the money, and that seems to be the object of this particular legislation; but I submit to the Senator there is very great harm in another respect. We are aiding a man who violates the law of a State.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not in the slightest possible degree, with due respect to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. You grant him a license, and let him take the chance of having the license considered valid or not, to do a thing which the laws of the State prohibit. You therefore lend yourself to him as far as he may suppose he is protected by the license to violate the law of his own State. Now, I understand the honorable member to say that in his State they have a law against the selling of liquor, a pretty rigid one I believe it is; but they have not been able to enforce it, and they have not been able to enforce it because people will sell liquor. He assumes that to be true, and of course it is, because he says it is true. Is it the business of Congress to say to the men in Maine who are violating the State law, "We will give you a license provided you will pay for it, and you may fight it out with your State if you think proper?" Is not that virtually saying, "We will stand alongside of you so far as the authority which the license may give to enable you to violate the law of your State is concerned; but we are only willing to do that upon the condition that you pay us something?" We therefore by such legislation get into the Treasury a fund arising from licenses granted to persons in the States to violate the laws of the States.

That I am sure the Senator does not mean to say is morally right; but I think he forgets, if he will permit me to say so, that this is a question of power and not of expediency. The question which I submitted to the Senate was, whether we have any right to authorize a State law to be violated in this particular. The first part of the section proceeds upon the ground that we have no such right, but after saying we have no such right then it directly says in the same breath, "Although no license which we shall grant you will authorize you to carry on any trade or business prohibited by the laws of the State, yet if you will pay us for granting you the license we will grant it." I could not make my own view of it plainer, perhaps, by multiplying words. I think, therefore, with due deference to my friend the chairman of the committee, that it is legally wrong, and, if he will permit me to say so, as he advocates a different view of it, it is morally wrong.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it is legally right and morally right, and there is no such objection to it, and the only force there is in the Senator's objection is the legal ingenuity with which he urges it. In many of the States there are laws prohibiting the sale of liquor, for instance; for this section is intended particularly to cover those cases; but experience has shown that they will sell liquor in violation of the State law. Now, we are making a general law with regard to licenses. We license retailers of spirituous liquors. The Senator wants us to put it in such a shape with regard to all those States that have passed such a law as not to exact a license from the persons who sell liquor in those States in violation of the State laws, and thus lose a very large portion of revenue. The proposition is that we will in fact, so far as we are concerned, make an exemption in favor of the people who choose to sell liquor in violation of the laws of the States in all those States where such laws exist, and thus encourage them to that extent.

Now, what do we say by this section? We say, "Notwithstanding you live in States where the laws prohibit the sale of liquor, yet if you undertake to do it you shall be responsible to us just as you would be in a State where the laws do not prohibit it; you shall have, so far as we are concerned, no privileges over those who live in States where the laws do not prohibit it. If you undertake to deal in liquors, or anything else that is prohibited in your State, you shall be subject to our laws, and you shall not do it without a license; if you do, you will be subject to the penalty." But we say to them at the same time, and that sets the moral view of it right, "We want you to understand, notwithstanding we prohibit you from selling liquor without a license, we do not mean to authorize you to break the laws of the State; but if you choose to break those laws, although the license is a protection against us, it shall be no protection against the laws of the State, and you must take the consequences."

It is just like a man who has no title perhaps to real estate, if you please to say so. The Senator, I suppose, has drawn a great many quit-claim deeds in his life; and quit-claim deeds, perhaps, that did not convey very much; at least it was very doubtful. It was not considered bad morals if he told him, "Sir, you shall have my deed for a dollar; but I warn you that my title may prove to be good for nothing." The Senator would not hesitate to draw the deed and take his fee under those circumstances. He would not refuse to act on the ground of bad morals.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, I should.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I never knew of a lawyer yet that did.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should refuse unless there was color of title.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The morals of the profession must be particularly nice in Maryland.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know that they are any more nice there than elsewhere.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You do precisely in reference to that matter what is done here, so that the whole thing is understood by the party. We practice nothing upon him when we say to him, "You shall not proceed in this business, so far as we are concerned, without a license from us, and then you can settle your difficulties with the State as you choose." The effect of a contrary decision here would be to say that in all those States where men choose to violate the laws of the States, they shall do it with impunity so far as we are concerned. We in fact give them a license to do it without exacting any pay whatever. That is the result as it strikes me.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 25, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. HOSMER, of Buffalo, New York. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner of Agriculture, transmitting his annual report for 1863; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed by the Superintendent of Public Printing, under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, one hundred and fifty thousand extra copies of his annual report for 1863, with the accompanying documents, for the use of the present House, and fifty thousand extra copies for distribution by that Department, with the engravings interspersed through the volume in their appropriate places; and that ten thousand of these shall be printed for the use of said Department on fifty-six pound paper.

DISTRIBUTION OF BOOKS AND DOCUMENTS.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Printing, reported a joint resolution in relation to the distribution of books and documents; which was read a first and second time by its title.

The joint resolution provides that the undistributed portion of books and documents heretofore printed or purchased for its use by order of either House of Congress previous to the Thirty-Seventh Congress and now deposited in the Interior Department and elsewhere shall be distributed to members of the present Congress, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, and the committee is directed to divide the books in question into parcels equal in number to the whole number of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates from Territories and as nearly equal in value and importance as possible, and to distribute them to the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates by such method as may be found most feasible and proper.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. This joint resolution is reported from the Committee on Printing because the subject of distributing these books was referred to that committee. I call the previous question.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to inquire the number and value of the books that it is proposed to distribute.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I cannot state that.

Mr. KERNAN. I have learned at some time that these books were useful to the Government in making exchanges; and if that be so I am opposed to voting for this distribution. It seems to me that, without knowing their value, we ought not to vote to distribute these books among the members.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. This resolution relates to books heretofore printed or procured for the use of members of Congress. There are broken and imperfect sets, and in consequence there have been difficulties about their distribution. There are not enough full sets to go around, and this resolution is submitted for the purpose of making a satisfactory distribution. It relates to books ordered by the Senate and the House, and to none others.

Mr. COLE, of Washington. Was not a similar resolution passed at the last Congress?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Not precisely like this.

Mr. COLE, of Washington. In what respect does it differ?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. We provided at the last Congress that the distribution should be under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and this resolution proposes that the distribution shall be under the superintendence of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. COLE, of Washington. Will this distribute the books in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLE, of Washington. I have had occasion to inquire of the Secretary of the Interior or the person having charge of the books proposed to be distributed. Under the resolution passed at the last Congress if these books are distributed, or if they are distributed under this resolution, then there will be none left to present to the new States and Territories that may hereafter be organized. New States hereafter to be admitted into the Union will not get the books which have been provided for the new States since the formation of the Government. It strikes me that the House ought to look into the matter. It will be impossible for the new States to obtain these books unless from the source which we now propose to destroy. If the effect of the resolution be such as that the Secretary of the Interior shall distribute the books he has now on hand, then the new Territories and new States will be deprived of the archives of the Government. I think that the resolution ought not to be passed.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. These books were originally designed for distribution among the people, and I hope that the resolution will pass.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. These books were printed or procured for the use of the Senate or the House. They can only be distributed by order of Congress, and no one else has control over them. They belong to the two Houses for distribution among the people, and they are at present getting illegitimate distribution. They are melting away, and we think that they ought at once to be distributed among the members of Congress. I call for the previous question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the call for the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I only want to say a few words on the resolution. During the last Congress a resolution was passed similar in purport to this one, but not so full in detail. It was provided that these books should be distributed by the Secretary of the Interior, but it was found impossible to comply with that resolution so as to make the distribution as contemplated. The reason was because of the great number of broken sets, amounting to some twenty to forty volumes, and hence they could not be equally distributed among members of Congress. I do not know that those broken sets will ever be replenished; it is not probable that they will be; and I presume, taking the natural course of things, the numbers of them are getting smaller every day, and we might well distribute them in some way.

But there is a point I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts. Under a resolution of the Thirty-Fifth Congress there was a resolution adopted directing the distribution among the congressional districts of certain copies of the American State Papers. They have not all yet been distributed, and they are due to some of those congressional districts, and due properly. I refer to my own district for one. My immediate predecessor did not draw his copies while here, and he died soon after his time expired, and there are two sets due that district yet. I was notified officially three years ago by the librarian that they were due the district, and I applied for them then, and have continually applied for them from that time to this, but I have never been able to get them awarded. Others have had theirs awarded to their districts to make up what was deficient. Now, I would like to have the resolution amended if possible so as to provide that no documents which have heretofore been ordered by any resolution of Congress to be distributed shall be affected by the passage of this resolution.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania I will say that this resolution will not reach those books at all. They are already provided for, and still remain in the Department, subject to the direction of the successors of those former members who were entitled to them.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I demand the previous question on the third reading of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BEAMAN demanded the yeas and nays upon the passage of the resolution, and tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, demanded the previous question upon the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was passed.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OWEN TULLER.

Mr. VOORHEES presented the petition of Owen Tuller, a mail contractor, for compensation for the destruction of property on a mail route in Missouri by rebel guerrillas; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL made the following report from a committee of conference:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 198) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from their ninth amendment.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendments:

After the word "any," in the first line of said House amendment, insert the word "free," and strike out after the word "call," in the eighth line, all of said House amendment.

That the House recede from their amendment to the eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out of said Senate amendment after the enacting clause, (being section four,) and in lieu thereof insert the following, and the Senate agree to the same:

That in every case where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that any regiment of infantry, or any battery, or any company of cavalry, of colored troops has been enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States, under any authorized assurance given by any officer or agent of the United States, or by any Governor of any State authorized thereto by the President or the Secretary of War, the non-commissioned officers and privates of such regiment, battery, or company shall be paid the same as other troops of the same arm of the service, then they shall be so paid for the period of time counting from the date of their being respectively mustered into the service to the 1st day of January, 1864: Provided, however, that this section shall not be construed to prevent like payment to other colored troops from the time of their being mustered into the service if such shall be held by the proper authority to be their right under the law.

J. COLLAMER,
J. W. NESMITH,
J. W. GRIMES,

JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
J. F. FARNSWORTH,
JOHN A. GRISWOLD,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MORRILL. It will be seen that the Senate have receded from their seventh and ninth amendments, and have agreed to the eighth amendment with an amendment, which I think will be satisfactory to all parties. The matter was sufficiently explained by the reading of the report by the Clerk, and I call the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will allow us to say a word upon the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. It is that in the midst of this noise and confusion it is not even known upon this side of the House upon what bill the report of the committee is made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that the gentleman from Vermont rose to a privileged question, to make a report from a committee of conference upon the Army appropriation bill, whereupon the report was read by the Clerk, and the gentleman from Vermont rose subsequently and demanded the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman from Vermont will not at this time insist upon the demand for the previous question. I desire to submit a very few remarks upon the report.

Mr. MORRILL. I did not occupy any time myself in advocating the agreement of the conference committee, and I think it is but fair, therefore, that there should be no discussion on the other side. If I had occupied any time in advocating the report I would withdraw the demand for the previous question. As it is I cannot withdraw the demand.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope, then, that the demand for the previous question will be voted down.

The previous question was not seconded—yes 46, noes 60.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to state to the House simply what the committee of conference have done; and then if they choose to overrule the decision to which they came before by a vote of five to one, I shall have nothing to say.

When the House bill came back from the Senate, it contained the provision which is now agreed upon by the committee of conference, under which certain colored troops, who had been promised full pay for the time of their enlistment, were to receive full pay, leaving all the rest out. The Committee of Ways and Means reported an amendment striking that out and inserting in lieu thereof a provision that all colored troops should be allowed full pay and placed on an equality with white troops from the time of their enlistment and mustering into the service. That proposition was carried by an overwhelming majority.

But, sir, the committee of conference have seen fit to disregard the instructions of the House upon that point, and restore the provision of the Senate entire, with the exception of adding a proviso that this shall not affect the existing law in regard to others, thereby leaving the implication that the whole matter, which we had hoped was settled, was open again to be adjudicated by the Departments.

Now, I say that those in this House who have advocated the employment of negro troops are bound in justice and fairness to treat them precisely as they treat white soldiers. I have no idea that those who call themselves by any other name—conservatives, if you please—shall dodge this question and put the matter on the ground of being referred to some other tribunal. It is due to ourselves, I repeat, that, if we accept the services of colored troops, they should be paid for their services like any other soldiers; and I would rather lose the whole bill than adopt the principle of doing injustice to those who enlisted from patriotic motives merely, and of doing justice only to those who enlisted from mercenary motives.

Now, that is the whole question. I do not wish to occupy the time of the House, but I wish to bring the matter fairly to their attention. I hope the report of the committee of conference will be voted down and that we shall have another committee which will represent the wishes of the House.

Mr. MORRILL. By the existing law all the colored soldiers from the 1st of January last are to receive the same pay as white soldiers. By the amendment of the Senate, adopted by them in lieu of the House provision, it was provided that all colored persons enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States shall be entitled to receive the amount of pay allowed by law, provided that the full pay of white soldiers shall be allowed to such as were promised it by competent authority at the time of their enlistment.

By the agreement of the committee of conference it will be seen that colored troops who have had reason to expect the pay of white soldiers by reason of pledges on the part of the Secretary of War and Governors of States are to receive it. Now, to make a sweeping clause giving all colored troops, or all such persons employed in the Army, that full amount of pay, dating back to the beginning of the war, would involve the drawing of a very large amount from the Treasury—much larger than for one I feel willing at this time to authorize. The committee of conference have inserted a proviso at the end of their amendment in substance, that if all these colored troops shall be decided by proper authority to be entitled under the existing law to the full pay of white troops, as it is contended by the Attorney General of the United States, they shall then receive it. This report of the committee of conference, as I understand it, covers every case where any encouragement has been given by the government of any State or by any officer authorized by the War Department to give it; and yet it does not prevent its being paid to those who have no such encouragement if, according to the Attorney General, it is the legal right of the parties so to have it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Vermont if the committee of conference, in the report they have made, provide that all negroes in the service shall have the same pay as white soldiers hereafter?

Mr. MORRILL. That has been provided by another law.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then that is not the question involved?

Mr. MORRILL. That is not the question involved here.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish the gentleman would state what the question is.

Mr. MORRILL. The report involves the question of the payment of colored men enlisted prior to January 1, 1864.

Mr. GARFIELD. All colored men?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir; all free colored men.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman state what the point involved is?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will state, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Ohio, that the question involved in this discussion is the question which was passed upon by the Military Committee of the House; and the section which has been adopted by the conference committee is almost identical with the section agreed upon by the Military Committee of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. What did it provide for?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. For the payment of such regiments of infantry, such batteries, and such companies of cavalry of colored men as had been enlisted with an authorized assurance that they should receive certain pay and bounty. This provides that on the Secretary of War being informed to his satisfaction that they had such assurances he shall order them to be paid at the same rate as other troops.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman refers to the amendment agreed upon by the Military Committee. I ask him if that was not overruled and voted down by the House, who adopted the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means, which is now rejected.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The House did adopt certainly a different section, which the Senate amended, and which was referred to the conference committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman state what the clause was which is rejected?

Mr. STEVENS. Let me state it again, if I may be allowed this irregularity. The House decided that all free persons of color who had entered the Army should from the time of their mustering in be allowed the same pay as white soldiers. The amendment of the committee of conference is that those who were promised it shall receive it, leaving all others to the old law. The difference, therefore, is between those who can prove that they had a specific promise and those who were enlisted without it, although all are in the same service.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The report of the committee of conference in this case, if adopted by the House and the Senate, will not preclude the passage of any law authorizing the payment of colored men enlisted before the 1st of January last at the same rates as other troops. This simply provides so far, that such colored troops as were enlisted with the assurance that they should receive the same pay and bounty as white troops shall be so paid, and as was stated by my colleague on the committee, [Mr. MORRILL], as sweeping law for the payment of all colored troops clear back from the commencement of the war to the present time, thirteen dollars a month and the same bounty as white men were paid, would make a very large draft upon the Treasury. There is equity in paying regiments and companies who were enlisted with the assurance that they should receive certain pay and bounty; it is equitable and just that they should be paid that pay and bounty. But where men were enlisted with assurances from the War Department that they were only to receive so much per month and no bounty, they cannot urge the equity and justice of the claim.

Mr. DRIGGS. I would ask the gentleman whether the colored troops massacred at Fort Pillow were enlisted under the old law, and whether the bill as now proposed to be passed will provide for payment to the heirs of those slaughtered soldiers?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I believe nothing in relation to that subject was referred to the committee of conference.

Mr. DRIGGS. I understand that the bill does not provide for that. I am in favor of paying them even if it does involve a large amount.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The heirs and representatives of colored soldiers are placed on the same footing as the heirs and representatives of other soldiers, not by this bill, but by other legislation of Congress. It is understood that we have already provided that all colored soldiers enlisted after the 1st day of January last shall receive the same pay and bounty as white soldiers. The question now is shall we go back to the commencement of the war and pay them at that rate?

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call the attention of the House to the precise state of the question as it is now presented. As the bill was originally sent from the House to the Senate there was nothing in it upon this subject. When it came back from the Senate, it came with this clause:

That all persons enlisted and mustered into the service as volunteers under the call dated October 17, 1863, for three hundred thousand volunteers, who were at the time of enlistment actually enrolled and subject to draft in the State in which they volunteered, shall receive from the United States the same amount of bounty without regard to color.

To that the House adopted this substitute:

That all free persons of color who have been or may be mustered into the military service of the United States shall, from the date of their enlistment, receive the same uniform, clothing and equipments, camp equipment, rations, medicine and hospital attendance, pay and emoluments and bounty, as other soldiers of the regular and volunteer forces of the United States of like arm of the service.

Mr. STEVENS. When the bill came from the Senate it came with a proviso giving this full pay to those who had been promised it, and to no others.

Mr. MORRILL. I have read what came from the Senate on this subject, every word of it, and the House provision adopted as a substitute shows the difference there is between the two propositions.

The committee of conference found the Senate very fixed in their purpose not to go back and include any others among these colored troops except those who had received the assurance from competent authority that they should receive it. The substitute adopted by the committee of conference received the unanimous concurrence of that committee as a fair compromise between the two Houses.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I would like to ask the gentleman from Vermont how it is to be ascertained what troops have received that assurance.

Mr. MORRILL. By the records of the Department.

Mr. UPSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont how this proposition will affect the pay of colored troops who were enlisted prior to the 1st of January, 1864, or of those who have enlisted since that time.

Mr. MORRILL. Under the existing law those who have enlisted since the 1st of January will be entitled to the same pay as white soldiers. Under the provision as agreed upon by the committee of conference it will be seen that all classes of colored troops who, on their enlistment, received assurance that they should receive the same pay as white soldiers, including two regiments from Massachusetts, and some others, are to receive the pay promised them. The section as agreed upon by the committee of conference is as follows:

That in every case where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that any regiment of infantry, or any battery, or any company of cavalry, of colored troops, has been enlisted and mustered under any authorized assurance given by any officer or agent of the United States, or by any Governor of any State authorized thereto by the President or the Secretary of War, that the non-commissioned officers and privates of such regiments, battery, or company shall be paid the same as other troops of the same arm of the service, then they shall be so paid for the period of time counting from the date of their being respectively mustered into the service to the 1st day of January, 1864: Provided, however, That this section shall not be construed to prevent like payment to other colored troops from the time of their being mustered into the service, if such shall be held by the proper authority to be their right under the law.

I have been unable to ascertain the amount which would be drawn from the Treasury by paying all these freedmen who have been employed in Louisiana and other States from the commencement of the war, although in minor positions, the full amount; but I am assured that it would involve many millions of dollars. I think we are doing full justice to these men, and I hope the House will sustain the action of the committee of conference.

Mr. STEVENS. The House amendment provided only for free people of color. The gentleman misleads the House by speaking of it as if it included all persons of color who had been employed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who speaks of the House amendment as embracing only free people of color, whether he does not recognize all persons enlisted in the Army of the United States as free.

Mr. STEVENS. The word "free" was inserted for the express purpose of excepting all those who are taken from slavery. I think the House understands the distinction, and I have nothing further to say. I had rather see this bill go down forever than to see this amendment of the committee of conference adopted.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, as I understand this question it is this: whether we will pay the free blacks who volunteered in the service of the United States anterior to the 1st day of January last, without stipulating that they shall have any higher pay than ten dollars a month, as much as we have agreed to pay those who did stipulate that they should have a higher rate. Now, sir, I regard it as more equitable to those who disinterestedly entered the service and risked their lives without claiming that they should have ten, thirteen, or sixteen dollars per month. They went in and fought our battles, and the question now is whether they should be paid according to the same measure of payment as those who did stipulate for higher pay. There is no doubt that in some parts of the country they received encouragement that Congress would do them justice and put them on the same footing with white soldiers. I know that is the case; and I know that free blacks enlisted on the understanding, though they did not stand back to make an express covenant that they should have one sum or another, that ultimately Congress should make them in their pay equal to white soldiers. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that we had better not pass this bill than to do injustice to these patriotic men. I think that all the free blacks, who have voluntarily gone into the service either before or after the 1st day of January, 1864, should have the same pay.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to differ with my colleague on a matter so delicate and important as the one before the House, to which I beg to call the attention of members for a few moments. The question is not whether we shall or shall not pay the free blacks who enlisted in the service from the free States the same as white soldiers from the date of enlistment. That question is not before the House. The question was once before us whether the increased pay of all colored troops should reach back beyond the 1st of January. The House decided affirmatively, but restricted the provision to such volunteers from the free States alone as had an authorized pledge at the time of enlistment that they should receive higher pay. It is proposed to-day to pay thousands of colored soldiers what they were never promised, what they never had a right to expect to receive. It is now proposed to go back and pay colored soldiers thirteen dollars per month, besides rations and clothing, for a time when the law did not allow them but ten dollars per month, clothing included. It is proposed to grant gratuities to these men which you have never given to white soldiers, so far as I know, in any case. There are plenty of instances—I could spend half an hour in giving them—where white men have gone into the military service with the understanding that they were to be paid a certain additional sum, and it has been found afterwards that there was no law for it, and they have not been paid. Men have been enlisted as engineer soldiers, with the understanding from the recruiting officers that they should be paid as such by the Government, but in looking at the matter subsequently it was found there was no law for it, and they were not paid. There has been legislation to cover such cases, but it has generally been prospective and not retrospective.

I have for a long time believed that God would never give us victory in this great struggle till the nation does justice to the black man. When he puts on the uniform of a soldier he ought to have the honors, the pay, and the protection of a soldier; and I have voted and shall always vote to place all American soldiers on the same footing, without regard to color. But I do not propose to pat the black man upon the back merely because he is black. I do not propose to do for him what I would not do for a white man. I do not propose to show any special favoritism in the application of the law. I will not propose to consent to putting the hand of Congress into the Treasury of the United States to draw out millions therefrom, and scattering it among a body of men to whom it was never promised, but who enlisted under the law fixing their pay at seven dollars per month and clothing. The antecedent question, whether that law was wise and politic, is quite another thing. I believe it was not wise. I believe we ought to have made the pay of the white and black soldier the same in the beginning; but Congress thought otherwise in 1862. This Congress has equalized the pay of black and white soldiers, and has raised the pay of all private soldiers, black and white, to sixteen dollars from the 1st day of May. I am unwilling to go back of that date to pay either black or white what they were not promised. I am not desirous of making political capital by showing an excessive zeal for the black man. I do not say that any of these gentlemen desire to do so, but I say affirmatively that I do not desire to make any political capital out of this matter by showing extreme haste in making this gratuitous and unnecessary disbursement of the public moneys when we have none to waste.

Mr. THAYER. I would like to ask the gentleman by what authority, by what law, the Secretary of War was authorized to promise a compensation to certain regiments, of which other regiments were to be deprived. And I would like to ask him what law authorized the Secretary of War to make use of any discrimination in the matter.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am not aware that the Secretary had any right to make any discrimination. I did not say that he had any such right.

Mr. THAYER. I would ask the gentleman the further question: upon what ground has Congress a right to discriminate between men who have borne the perils and burdens of the war?

Mr. GARFIELD. We always use the right, when we are called upon to do justice to men, to decide whether in good faith those men went into the service under an arrangement by which they had the right to suppose they would have that which they do not receive.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me to be sound law and sound justice that whether the Secretary of War was or was not authorized to make promises to these men, yet if the promise was given, and they enlisted and were mustered into the service with the expectation of the fulfillment of that promise, the Government is bound to fulfill the contract between the contract officers and these black men.

Mr. STEVENS. I would ask the gentleman whether he does not know that the Attorney General of the United States has decided that that discrimination was unlawful, and that every black man enlisted was entitled to thirteen dollars a month.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I know the Attorney General has so decided.

Mr. MORRILL. If that is so this provision will give it to them.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. But that does not change the position of the question. The promise was made, and the Government has accepted the services of those men, knowing that the promise was made, and I hold it to be good law that the Government is bound to pay them.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] if he made any personal allusion to myself when he referred to some gentleman who desired to make political capital by patting the negro on his back?

Mr. GARFIELD. I distinctly stated that I did not know that any gentleman desired to make political capital out of this matter. I said affirmatively that I did not.

Mr. STEVENS. That is the same affirmative proposition which is contained in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not understand the pertinency of that to the matter in hand.

Mr. SPALDING. I asked the gentleman whether he alluded to me in that remark.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have already said I made no personal reference to any gentleman, nor do I intend to do so. I was about to say in reference to the report of the committee of conference that when this measure was before the House I did all I honorably could to procure the passage of the bill in the shape I desired it, but since I have become satisfied that we could not carry out our desire, I have been in favor of making some concession to the other branch of Congress for the sake of getting as near it as we could. If, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] says, the committee of conference is bound to stand by the action of the House, we could not come to any agreement if the committee upon the part of the Senate should take the same view of their duty. The very idea of such a committee is that there shall be mutual concession and a mutual composition of the differences between the two Houses. The committee of conference in this case has made such concession, and the concession has been mutual. It has not been an abandonment of all we asked and a granting of all the Senate asked, but a mutual concession, the result of which is that we get something of what we wanted, if not all. I am, therefore, in favor of adopting the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. THAYER. It is in vain to attempt to disguise the gross injustice of the proposition now before the House. No sophistry can possibly sustain it. The argument made use of is that the Secretary of War gave promises to some particular colored regiments which were raised, while others received no such promises. If this be so, I ask who authorized the Secretary of War to make this discrimination with regard to the Army of the United States? I ask what act of Congress or what law empowers the Secretary of War to make a difference between the pay of soldiers received into the service of the Government?

Sir, I am bound to suppose that the Secretary of War, in making any such promises to black regiments, if any such were made, acted upon the presumption that Congress would, when it assembled, do justice to all the soldiers of the Republic, black as well as white, and that the former would be placed upon a just and equitable footing in regard to pay and rations as well as the white soldiers of the Government. It never could have entered into the mind of the Secretary of War that he was empowered to make any discrimination in regard to the pay of the soldiers of the Union, or to promise this regiment one rate of pay and that another. He never could have meant to be understood in that manner. He must have acted on the idea that Congress intended to place all of these soldiers upon the same footing, and that as soon as Congress assembled they would do justice to these men who had shed their blood and imperiled their lives in defense of the country.

I say, therefore, that the argument made use of that the Secretary of War had promised an advance of pay to some regiments falls to the ground. Any man who treated with the Secretary of War on the subject must have well known that he had no authority to make any such promises, and that they must look eventually for justice in that respect to the Congress of the United States; and the colored soldiers who went into the service of the country relying upon the eventual justice which is said to have been promised to them by the officers of the Government must have supposed that Congress, when they came to act at all upon this question, would do what is plain and simple justice to them all, without distinction, and would not pick out certain regiments and favor them to the exclusion of others which have rendered the same service.

Sir, the very fact, if it be a fact, that this pay was promised to certain regiments, I have no doubt encouraged others to enlist, because it never could have been supposed by any one who had any confidence in the justice of this country that certain regiments among the black troops would be picked out by Congress for just compensation, and that men who had undergone the same perils, who had shed their blood in the same cause, and who had made the same sacrifices, would be denied that just compensation.

Mr. KELLEY. With the permission of my colleague, I may be able to mention a fact or two that will throw some light upon this question. When it was first determined to recruit negro troops orders were sent to the department of South Carolina, and authority was given to the Governor of Massachusetts to recruit colored troops, and the statement went forth that they were to receive the same pay, rations, clothing, &c., as all the troops of the United States. Subsequently to that, the question whether these orders were consistent with existing laws was raised and was submitted by the Secretary to the Solicitor of the War Department, who, upon examining the various acts, decided that the act of July 17 provided ten dollars a month as the pay to be given to the colored people, whether enlisted or merely employed by the Government under that act. Accordingly an order went forth to the pay department to act in accordance with that law.

The first South Carolina and the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth Massachusetts regiments had been recruited and sent to the field, and other regiments were in process of recruiting when notice was given of the construction put upon the act in respect to the pay of colored soldiers. That construction, though doubted by large numbers of citizens, was not officially questioned until quite recently, when it was referred by the President to the Attorney General, who decided that the construction given by the War Department was erroneous, that the provision of Congress limiting the pay to ten dollars a month was not intended to embrace regularly enlisted men, but that it should be confined to laborers and others employed out of the military service proper; so that under the decision of the Attorney General every one of these soldiers is entitled to receive the same pay as white soldiers, under existing law, from the time he entered the service of the United States.

Mr. THAYER. I ask the gentleman whether they must not under that decision be paid thirteen dollars a month?

Mr. KELLEY. We have been paying them but ten dollars a month. Colonel Higginson, who was authorized to recruit the first South Carolina regiment, received special instructions to assure them that they would receive thirteen dollars a month, with the same rations as other United States soldiers.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask my colleague if he does not know that these regiments refused to receive ten dollars a month?

Mr. KELLEY. I was about saying that the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth Massachusetts have refused to receive any pay at all. The Governor of Massachusetts tendered them an amount sufficient to make their pay equal to that of white soldiers; they, however, unanimously refused to receive it from Massachusetts, saying that they were not fighting for money, that they were fighting in the service of the United States, and desired to be recognized as in that service, and as United States soldiers.

Mr. STEVENS. And one regiment from Pennsylvania refused it.

Mr. KELLEY. If my colleague will allow me to go on he will find that I understand the facts of the case. I was about to add that one regiment from Pennsylvania had refused, with those from Massachusetts, to receive a less rate of pay than is given to United States soldiers; and a still more striking fact I will mention in respect to the first South Carolina regiment is, that they were paid thirteen dollars a month, but under the new construction of the law given by the Solicitor of the War Department, the payment of three dollars made at first was proposed to be deducted from their subsequent pay; so that it appears that it was not only the express instruction of the War Department when they were recruited to place them upon the same basis as to pay as the white soldiers, but that under those instructions at least one payment was actually made.

Mr. THAYER. I am much obliged to the gentleman for his explanation. I do not know upon what basis the War Department has proceeded in its treatment of this subject. I can understand, sir, that an honest difference may exist in this House upon the question discussed when this bill was before the House, namely, whether the pay of colored troops should be made equal to that of white troops; but I cannot understand upon what principle of justice or of public policy it can be pretended that in paying colored troops you may discriminate between those who have made the same sacrifices, performed the same labors, and braved the same perils of war. For these reasons, sir, I think it is plain that the paltry pretense made, that some of these men have received promises from the War Department and some have not, and therefore that the former should be paid and the latter should not, falls to the ground as an argument. No man can pretend to say that such an argument has any foundation in justice, good faith, or an honorable public policy. Sir, all of these men are alike entitled to the justice of the country, and none are entitled to be preferred to others because they may have received left-handed promises from the War Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman why he repeatedly speaks of left-handed or indirect promises. I would like to know if the gentleman can inform us what these left-handed promises were. The information I have is that these men had direct pledges as to the pay they were to receive; there were no left-handed promises made.

Mr. THAYER. I will explain to the gentleman's satisfaction what I mean. I mean, sir, that no promise pretended to have been given by the Secretary of War was a valid or legal promise; that if made it was a promise without authority of law, and cannot therefore be set up as a just ground of discrimination between the different regiments of colored soldiers. I mean to say that I suppose what these men received from the War Department was something in the nature of encouragement, for the Secretary of War was not authorized to do more. The Secretary of War was not authorized to make a promise in this respect which would bind the Government.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then all I have to say is, that if those promises were of that vague, indirect character, the money will not be paid under the legislation already had.

Mr. THAYER. Then, sir, the sooner we require the money to be paid the better, and the more just will be the position this body will occupy before the country.

Sir, this excuse for discrimination is mere sophistry; there is nothing in it at all. There is no one who does not see that the equity and justice claimed by the two classes of colored troops, referred to are equal. No man can say that the men who in the same service have undergone the same hardships and exposed their lives to the same perils should not be paid alike.

But, sir, it is said that it will involve the expenditure of some money to do justice to these troops, that it will require a large sum of money to do it. Grant it; but, sir, we had better pay the money and economize in some other respects. We cannot afford to hazard the reputation of our country for justice and fair dealing to save a paltry sum of money. Let gentlemen find out some other pretext for not paying alike those who served alike. If they wish to economize let them begin their economical reforms in some less objectionable quarter and carry them out in a manner which will not strike down the justice and good faith of the country.

Mr. ROSS. I move to recommit the report to the committee, with instructions that they report it back with a provision to increase the pay of the soldiers to at least twenty dollars per month.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a question of order. I make the point of order that the motion is not germane to the pending proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I wish to assign very briefly the reasons for the vote I shall give. The law authorizing the President to accept the services of volunteers, I believe, nowhere limits them to white volunteers. It was his privilege to accept colored soldiers on the first day that he accepted regiments from Pennsylvania and Massachusetts. The law providing for the pay of the soldiers makes no reference in the original form to the color of the soldier. The Secretary of War had no right, if he did so, to put colored regiments upon different terms from those which he had a right to apply to white soldiers. I understand that the construction of the law at the Department has been different, and that the action of the Government has been different from this view. I merely desire to put the law explicitly and peremptorily as I presumed it was, and for that reason I shall vote to adhere to the section in the shape in which the House put it.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat astonished at the warmth of the debate on this subject; and I can only explain it to myself upon the supposition that gentlemen do not apprehend clearly the points of difference between the form which this section assumed when it was offered as an amendment to the House bill and passed here and the form in which it is presented by the committee of conference in their report. It has been alluded to here by gentlemen who have spoken on the assumption that there are those who wish to make invidious distinctions between colored troops and other troops. I undertake to say that if there be invidious distinction it is not in the bill of the House or the report of the committee of conference.

What are the facts in reference to this whole matter? Both Houses have agreed to this feature of the bill, that black soldiers and white shall be put upon the same footing, and paid in the same manner and the same amount, relating back to the date of that policy which the two Houses fixed to take effect on the 1st of January last. That, then, is settled.

Now there are certain black troops who enlisted in the service of the United States and served at a date prior to the 1st of January. What shall be done with regard to them? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] moved an amendment when the bill was formerly before the House, which is the section contended for by those who claim to be the peculiar friends of the black troops, and which provides that every free colored soldier who was enlisted prior to the 1st of January, 1864, shall be put upon the same footing with white troops, but it cuts off from any such claim all those colored troops who, by any construction of law, any pretense, or any admission, held the relation which formerly existed between them and those who had been their masters in the slave States.

Now the committee of conference say they will go behind the 1st of January. In what respect? That they will go behind the 1st of January and declare that all those colored troops who in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, and elsewhere were enlisted upon any assurance that they should be put upon an equality with the white troops shall be so treated, no matter what construction may be put upon the law by the War Department; and that as to all others who are not included in any such contract or assurance or engagement they shall receive pay under the law, and that nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent their receiving it. They make no distinction between the freedmen and the slaves, and they say that all free men of color, and those formerly slaves, shall be put upon the same footing, no matter what the construction of the law may be. The distinction formerly made between those two classes is not made by the committee of conference. They make no difference in reference to the status which they formerly had. That distinction was only made by the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and which was adopted by the House, and which is now part of the bill. Perhaps the discrimination was made with a purpose. But if gentlemen are desirous to wipe out all distinction let them go with the committee of conference, who decide, as against the War Department and all constructions made to the contrary there or elsewhere, that those who have had assurances of the kind referred to shall be absolutely paid, and that those, whether freedmen or slaves, who have had no such assurances shall be remitted to the law as construed here by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] and other gentlemen and by the Attorney General to receive precisely what others receive under like circumstances. I shall vote to sustain the committee of conference.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say that when this bill was returned from the Senate, and was under consideration in this House, the gentleman from Indiana moved to strike out the sixth amendment of the Senate. By some mistake or fault of my own I was recorded on the Journal as having voted in the affirmative upon the adoption of the Senate amendment. I attempted to correct the Journal; and the mistake was corrected in the report made to the associated press. But being an inexperienced member here, I did not follow up the correction quite far enough, and I find I am recorded in the Globe as having voted for the Senate amendment. I desired to make this statement, so that the correction may appear in the Globe.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman is correctly reported in the Journal.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I submit to gentlemen who have been discussing this question that the recommendation of the conference committee only proposes to discriminate in favor of those who had a legal and authorized assurance—not any left-handed assurance or innuendo, but an assurance from an authorized party—that they should receive this pay.

Mr. THAYER. I would like to ask the gentleman whence that legal authority was derived.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I am giving you the recommendation of the conference committee. They only report in favor of doing thus and so provided a legal and authorized assurance was given. Again, I submit that if the ruling of the Attorney General be established, there can be no legal discrimination made between the colored and the white troops.

Mr. STEVENS. Then had we not better settle the question definitely in this bill, and not leave it open?

Mr. GRISWOLD. All I can say in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania is that the committee of conference found diverging sentiments and extreme views in either direction, and they knew of no other way in which to reconcile the action of the two Houses except by some medium course that should satisfy measurably all parties in the two Houses.

Now, I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Thayer] who last spoke, whether there is any greater injustice in this discrimination in pay between colored and white troops than there is in the discrimination between the pay of the white troops themselves.

I submit to the gentleman that there are very great inequalities existing in the pay of white troops. A large number of the white troops who have entered the service of the United States have done so without any bounty at all, while a large number of others have received very large bounties. I submit that if we do justice in the present emergency of the country, that is all that can be expected of Congress. Hereafter, if the gentleman chooses to appeal to our magnanimity or our benevolence, why then, for one, I shall be willing to go with him in that direction. But I submit that this is no time for any undue liberality or magnanimity. If we do justice to these black troops that is all that can be required of us.

Mr. MORRILL. I am about to demand the previous question, but before doing so I desire to call the attention of the House back to the original proposition. As the bill passed the House there was nothing in it in relation to this subject. The Senate, more regardful of the interests of the colored men than were the House, introduced a proposition. The House took that up, and, not thinking that it went far enough, they went still further, and so far that the Senate regarded it as involving too heavy an expense upon the Treasury, more than it can afford to bear at the present time. It does not seem to me that this is a question for any great deal of eloquence or heat. I do not see any reason why we should get excited over this proposition, when we originally voted ourselves here to pay colored men only ten dollars per month. That was the original proposition.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me correct the gentleman. We voted no such thing in the Army bill.

Mr. MORRILL. A year ago we voted to pay colored men ten dollars per month.

Mr. STEVENS. Not colored troops, but simply contrabands employed about camps.

Mr. MORRILL. There is no provision in relation to that, except that we provided that we would pay them ten dollars a month. Now it is proposed that we shall go back and pay all of these men who have been employed in the Army, in minor offices, in menial employments, wherever they have been enlisted and employed by the Army, the full sum that we have paid our white troops from the start. Under existing circumstances, and in view of the condition of the Treasury, I think that we ought to hesitate before we place such a heavy burden upon the Treasury. And yet my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] comes in here and, with his usual emphasis, says that he is willing to lose this Army bill rather than forgo the privilege of being thus magnanimous to a portion of the colored troops who have never received any assurance, either from us or from the War Department, that they were to receive any such sum as it is now proposed to pay them.

Under the circumstances, at this late stage of the session, when we are all anxious to terminate it as early as possible, I think it wise that we should not, as legislators, assume that all other men shall agree with us. I was originally in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS] but finding that it is going to involve so large a sum I was ready to yield my opinion. I think it is but fair that we should yield something, and should admit that the judgment of other men is worth something as well as our own. I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to withdraw the previous question, and I will renew it.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw the previous question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored to hear what has been said in this discussion, but I am afraid, from the noise in the lively House, with ill success. If I can understand the subject and the report of the committee of conference, it is proposed to pay a portion of the negro troops in the service of the United States, by retroactive operation, thirteen dollars a month from the date of enlistment, leaving a still larger portion of the negro troops to be paid at the rate of ten dollars a month. The reason given for that is, as I understand, that certain persons holding official relations with the Government, without any authority of law to do so, made promises or gave assurances to those regiments that are proposed to be thus distinguished that Congress would in the future make their pay equal to that of the white troops, or would make no distinction as to pay between the negro and white troops; and that, as to other negro regiments, no such encouragement had been held out. That I understand to be the ground substantially on which this discrimination rests. I am not satisfied that such a discrimination is just.

I do not believe that such a distinction between negro troops in the employment of the Government should be made. I can see no reason for it. My own opinions on the business of employing negro troops are well known. But, sir, if I were in favor of employing negro troops I should certainly make no distinction between different regiments of negro troops in their pay or between their pay and the pay of white troops. Whoever consents to employ the African race as soldiers in this war has pledged himself before the country and before mankind that he will treat the African race upon the principles of justice and equality. He has no right to hesitate after he has done that thing. He cannot take the position of calling a subject race into this struggle for the preservation of the Union, taking that race through all the blood and suffering of a long war, and then denying to it justice and equality. He cannot do it. I would be ashamed to do it if I were responsible for calling the African race into this struggle. Witnessing here from day to day the hesitation of anti-slavery politicians, I am almost tempted to hold the opinion expressed by a distinguished leader of the ultra-abolitionists—that no honest abolitionist can take office under the Government of the United States. I have seen men holding office under the Government of the United States fall so far short of that to which they are pledged by the principles on which they profess to stand, that I am almost tempted to come to the same conclusion. Men responsible for arming the African race, for its sufferings and blood, hesitate here to give the negro the right to vote. For shame! For shame! You employ negroes to the extent of one hundred and thirty thousand men, you seek the aid of more than twice that number, to fight for you, to die for you, to preserve your Government, to give you empire, and then you refuse to allow them the commonest rights of men. Do not tell me that you give the negro liberty, and that that is a fair compensation for his struggles and blood. Just men, wherever through the world, will remain unsatisfied with you. You merely mock him by giving him liberty and then denying him all those rights which give value to liberty in the eyes of every man fit to be free. Come, be consistent; follow your principles, and let us, although we cannot agree with, at least respect you. Tell the country that you aim at abolishing all distinctions of race and color. The country may sustain you, and there's an end of the struggle. The country may condemn you, and then, if you have the truth, "learn to labor and to wait."

Mr. Speaker, I shall not vote to make any difference in the pay of negro troops in the service of the Government. If I shall vote to pay any I shall vote to pay all. I cannot make any discrimination between them. What right had the Secretary of War to promise to the fifty-fourth Massachusetts regiment of negro troops thirteen dollars a month? Or why should he have hesitated to hold out the same encouragement to other negro regiments? Would Congress do justice to only the negroes of Massachusetts and not to all? But whence did he get the right to give any pledge for Congress? He had just the same right that he had to seize the World and Journal of Commerce in New York—to violate the freedom of the press, and thereby to insult liberty, to insult the whole American nation, to stamp our cause with the odium which attaches to vile tyranny. His promise was, as usual, worth nothing. It ought not to have misled anybody. The only ground on which this claim for back pay can be put is that the negro soldier is entitled to the same compensation as the white soldier; and that is as true in regard to the negro regiment as it is to another.

Now, sir, I shall not vote in any instance to pay any negro regiment. I will be perfectly frank with you, Mr. Speaker, and the House in that respect. I shall not expect, unless under duress, to pay negro soldiers ten dollars, thirteen dollars, or any other sum. If I do vote in any instance to pay negro troops it will be because the proposition is coupled with doing justice to the white soldiers of the land, and because I am compelled to do it for such a reason. But I say to those who are in favor of employing negro soldiers they cannot consistently make any distinction by law between one black regiment and another black regiment. We cannot afford to act upon any such principles. If we are to allow them to fight at all, and propose to do justice to black soldiers at all, we must do justice to all alike.

Why, sir, the twelve-months men raised in Kentucky—it is true they were nothing but white men—were promised by the recruiting officers $100 bounty. They fought under our flag to the best of their ability, with such humble courage and ability as white men possess, and having served out their term of enlistment, they were mustered out, and received only fifty dollars bounty. They then discovered that the recruiting officers who had promised $100 bounty had no authority to do so. They never have received that $100, and they never will from this Congress. There is no majority in this House feeling a sufficient interest in white soldiers to come here with a bill redeeming the promise made by the recruiting officers to those men. Yet these brave white men of Kentucky have served twelve months under the promise of $100 bounty, and are finally paid with fifty dollars.

Now, sir, my own opinion is that the true way would be to pay the negro soldiers what was promised them by law, and no more. But if you go behind the law, if you hold that it is odious and unjust to make a discrimination between negro soldiers and white soldiers, then every consideration of propriety, consistency, and justice obliges the advocates of negro soldiers to pay all such troops with an equal, impartial hand.

In accordance with my promise, I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the various propositions will be considered independently.

The SPEAKER. They will not. The gentleman can have the amendments read if he desires; but the vote must be taken upon the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to have the amendments read in connection with the report.

The amendments were read extenso.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 25, nays 121; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bally, Royd, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Thomas T. Davis, Farnsworth, Garfield, Griswold, Hooper, Kasson, Schenck, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Thomas, Tracy, Whaley, and Woodbridge—25.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Bontwell, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, Chandler, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Denton, Dixon, Donnelly Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Eldridge, Elliot, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Goodrich, Grider, Grinnell, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Holman, Assheton W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kelsey, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Leazear, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Mallory, Marcy, McClurg, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, James L. Morris, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Scott, Sloan, Spalding, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Sweet, Tilden, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Elisha B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—121.

So the report was rejected.

During the call of the roll, Mr. WEBSTER stated that his colleague, Mr. HARRIS, had been called home by sickness in his family, and that he had paired off with him.

Mr. GANSON stated that his colleague, Mr. ODELL, was detained at home by sickness.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House insist, and ask for another committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. STEVENS, PENDLETON, and DAVIS of New York, managers of said conference on the part of the House.

RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of yesterday, on the subject of the joint resolution of the 4th of last month relative to Mexico, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, to whom the resolution was referred.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WASHINGTON, May 24, 1864.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, May 24, 1864.

To the President:

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of yesterday, requesting the President to communicate to that House, if not inconsistent with the public interest, any explanations given by the Government of the United States to the Government of France respecting the sense and bearing of the joint resolution relative to Mexico, which passed the House of Representatives unanimously on the 4th of April, 1864, has the honor to lay before the President a copy of all the correspondence on file or on record in this Department on the subject of the joint resolution referred.

Respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Dayton.

[Extract.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, April 7, 1864.

SIR: * * * I send you a copy of a resolution which passed the House of Representatives on the 4th instant, by a unanimous vote, and which declares the opposition of that body to a recognition of a monarchy in Mexico. Mr. Geoffrey has lost no time in asking an explanation of this proceeding.

It is hardly necessary, after what I have heretofore written with perfect candor for the information of France, to say that this resolution truly interprets the unanimous sentiment of the people of the United States in regard to Mexico. It is, however, another and distinct question whether the United States would think it necessary or proper to express themselves in the form adopted by the House of Representatives at this time. This is a practical and purely executive question, and the decision of it constitutionally belongs not to the House of Representatives, nor even to Congress, but to the President of the United States. You will of course take notice that the declaration made by the House of Representatives is in the form of a joint resolution, which, before it can acquire the character of a legislative act, must receive, first, the concurrence of the Senate, and secondly, the approval of the President of the United States, or, in case of his dissent, the renewed assent of both Houses of Congress, to be expressed by a majority of two thirds of each body.

While the President receives the declaration of the House of Representatives with the profound respect to which it is entitled as an exposition of its views upon a grave and important subject, he directs that you inform the Government of France that he does not at present contemplate any departure from the policy which this Government has hitherto pursued in regard to the war which exists between France and Mexico. It is hardly necessary to say that the proceedings of the House of Representatives were adopted upon suggestions arising within itself, and not upon any communication of the executive department, and that the French Government would be seasonably apprised of any change of policy upon this subject which the President might at any future time think it proper to adopt.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Mr. Dayton to Mr. Seward.

No. 454. PARIS, April 22, 1864.

SIR: I visited M. Drouyn de l'Huys yesterday at the Department of Foreign Affairs. The first words he addressed to me on entering the room were, "Do you bring us peace or bring us war?" I asked him to what he referred, and he said he referred more immediately to those resolutions recently passed by Congress, in reference to the invasion of Mexico by the French, and the establishment of Maximilian upon the throne of that country. I said to him, in reply, that I did not think France had a right to infer that we were about to make war against her on account of anything contained in those resolutions; that they embodied nothing more than had been constantly held out to the French Government from the beginning. That I had always represented to the Government here that any action upon their part interfering with the form of government in Mexico would be looked upon with dissatisfaction in our country, and they could not expect us to be in haste to acknowledge a monarchical Government, built upon the foundation of a republic which was our next neighbor. That I had reason to believe you had held the same language to the French minister in the United States. This allegation he did not seem to deny, but obviously received the resolutions in question as a serious step upon our part; and I am told that the leading secessionists here build largely upon these resolutions, as a means of fomenting ill feeling between this country and some others and ourselves. Mr. Mason and his secretary have gone to Brussels to confer with Mr. Dudley Mann, who is their commissioner at that place. Mr. Slidell, it is said, was to have gone to Austria, although he has not yet got off.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM L. DAYTON.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State, &c.

Mr. Dayton to Mr. Seward.

No. 461. PARIS, May 2, 1864.

SIR: Immediately upon the receipt of your dispatch, No. 325, I applied to M. Drouyn de l'Huys for a special interview, which was granted for Saturday last. I then said that I knew that the French Government had felt some anxiety in respect to the resolution which had recently passed the House of Representatives in reference to Mexico; and inasmuch as I had just received a copy of that resolution, together with the views of the President of the United States, I begged, if agreeable, to read to him your dispatch in reference to the latter. To this he assented, and, as the shortest and most satisfactory mode, following out my instructions, I read to him that entire portion of your dispatch which applies to this subject, stating, at the same time, that I thought it was a remarkable illustration of the frankness and straightforwardness of the President. When the reading was closed, M. Drouyn de l'Huys expressed his gratification, and, after asking some questions in regard to the effect of laying a resolution upon the table in the Senate, the conversation terminated.

The extreme sensitiveness which was manifested by this Government when the resolution of the House of Representatives was first brought to its knowledge has, to a considerable extent at least, subsided.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM L. DAYTON.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Dayton.

[Extract.]

No. 542. DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, May 9, 1864.

SIR: Your dispatch of April 22, No. 454, has been received.

What you have said to M. Drouyn de l'Huys, on the subject of the resolution of the House of Representatives concerning Mexico, as you have repeated it, is entirely approved. The resolution yet remains unacted upon in the Senate.

Mr. Corwin was to leave Vera Cruz on the 2d instant, under the leave of absence granted to him by this Department on the 8th of August last.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

WILLIAM L. DAYTON, Esq., &c.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Dayton.

[Extract.]

No. 561. DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, May 21, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of May 2, No. 461, and to approve of your proceedings therein mentioned. We learn that Mr. Corwin, our minister plenipotentiary to Mexico, is at Havana, on his return to the United States, under leave of absence.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move that the papers be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. WILSON. I object to that part of the proposition that the committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. COX. I should like to say a few words on the subject.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I demand the previous question on my motion.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The papers were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, moved to reconsider the last vote; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IOWA LAND GRANT.

Mr. ALLISON. I submit the following report: The Clerk read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 381) to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State," approved May 8, 1856, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same amended to read as follows:

On page 2, line five of section one, strike out the words "by said company" and insert "and not further north of said town than the north line of section twenty-two, township eighty north, of range nineteen, according to the United States surveys, if the citizens of the county of Jasper shall first pay to said company the difference in cost, if any, between the line proposed by the company and the one contemplated by the proviso, including extra cost of right of way, if any, said difference in cost to be estimated by competent engineers to be selected by the parties."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven, thirteen, fifteen, seventeen, eighteen, nineteen, twenty, twenty-one, and twenty-two, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the twelfth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment, namely: In the tenth line of the said amendment between the word "the" and the word "line" insert the word "original;" and in line eleven of the amendment, after the word "railroad" insert the words "as laid down on a map on file in the General Land Office."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the fourteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: at the end of the amendment insert, "but each of said companies may select an equal quantity of public lands as described in this act within the distance of twenty miles of the line of each of said roads in lieu of lands thus settled upon and improved by bona fide inhabitants in good faith under color of title as aforesaid."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the sixteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: strike out the word "Legislature," in the said amendment, and in lieu thereof insert "Governor."

SOLOMON FOOT,
JAMES HARLAN,
L. W. POWELL,
WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
C. A. ELDRIDGE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ALLISON moved that the report be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MURDER OF CAPTAIN REED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of the House in regard to the murder of Captain T. Reed, of Philadelphia, by the citizens of Accomac, Virginia; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

MAIL STEAMERS TO BRAZIL.

Mr. ALLEY, by unanimous consent, moved that the House take up the amendment of the Senate, which is a verbal one, to House bill No. 407, authorizing the establishment of an ocean mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil, and that it be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to give notice to the House that it is my intention to call up the election case of Knox vs. Blair on Friday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate insist upon their amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill of the House (No. 395) to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and have appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. FOSTER, and Mr. JOHNSON the committee of conference on the part of the Senate.

MILITARY RAILROAD IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. SCHENCK. Among the many bills waiting to be reported by the Committee on Military Affairs is a joint resolution in relation to the construction of a military road from the valley of the Ohio river into East Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to report that resolution at this time.

The resolution was read by its title, as follows:

A joint resolution authorizing the President to construct a military railroad from the valley of the Ohio river into East Tennessee.

Mr. WILSON. I would inquire of the gentleman whether that resolution has been printed? It seems to me we ought not to consider such a bill without some opportunity to examine it.

Mr. SCHENCK. It has not been printed.

Mr. SMITH. Let the resolution be reported, and then we can fix upon a time when it shall be considered.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is a matter of the last importance that the subject should be acted on speedily.

The resolution was read in extenso.

Mr. HOLMAN. I simply desire to say, considering the magnitude of the subject, it would be inexpedient to act upon the resolution at once. I would not object to its introduction if its consideration is postponed to some reasonable day in the future.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am willing that it shall be reported and postponed until some future day. I hope an early day, however, will be fixed on, for Generals Grant, Burnside, Foster, and other generals represent that a road there is necessary, and two of those generals have considered it important enough to come and represent the matter before the committee.

Mr. SMITH. I trust the gentleman from Ohio will indicate an early day, because of the importance of the measure.

The SPEAKER. The day can be fixed after the resolution is reported. Is there objection to having it reported?

Mr. WILSON. I will not object if it is to be printed and postponed.

Mr. SMITH. I suggest that it be postponed until next Monday.

Mr. HOLMAN. That will be hardly long enough. I suggest next Friday week.

Mr. PRUYN. Oh, no; we will adjourn by that time, I hope.

Mr. SMITH. If this is postponed until next Friday week the probabilities are that for a week following there will not be a sufficient number of members present to transact business. According to all the testimony of military officers and others there has been no bill before Congress of more importance than this, and I hope gentlemen will not insist upon postponing it beyond Monday next. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his proposition for Friday next. By Monday the bill will have been printed and examined by everybody, and we can come to a conclusion that day as well as we can a week after.

Mr. HOLMAN. Monday it will interfere with other business.

Mr. SMITH. Say Tuesday, then.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not object to that.

Mr. GRIDER. According to my recollection this very proposition was before the House last session, was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, was reported by them, and passed; but subsequently a joint resolution was passed repealing the law.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir; and it would have been built long ago but for that.

Mr. GRIDER. I hope an early day will be fixed upon.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, reported the resolution, which was postponed until Tuesday next, made a special order from day to day until disposed of, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was postponed and made a special order; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE RECIPROCITY TREATY.

The House proceeded, as the regular order of business, to the consideration of joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) authorizing the President to give the requisite notice for terminating the treaty made with Great Britain on behalf of the British provinces in North America, and to appoint commissioners to negotiate a new treaty with the British Government, based upon the true principles of reciprocity; upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Clerk, before I proceed with my remarks, to read the resolution reported by the Committee on Commerce.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to give notice to the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland that it is the wish and intention of the Government of the United States of America to terminate the said treaty at the end of twelve months from the expiration of ten years from the time when the said treaty went into operation as aforesaid, such notice to be given at the expiration of the said term of ten years, to the end that the said treaty may be abrogated as soon as it can be done under the provisions thereof, unless a new convention shall before that time be concluded between the two Governments by which the provisions shall be abrogated or so modified as to be mutually satisfactory to both Governments; and that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint three commissioners, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the revision of said treaty, and to confer with other commissioners duly authorized therefor whenever it shall appear to be the wish of the Government of Great Britain to negotiate a new treaty between the two Governments, and the people of both countries, based upon true principles of reciprocity, and for the removal of existing difficulties.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, I have had the resolution reported by the Committee on Commerce read at the Clerk's desk because I desired that members of the House, before being called upon to vote upon it, should have their attention directed especially to its phraseology. It was found when the resolution that was offered at an early period of the session by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] came under discussion in the committee, that there were entertained there by the gentlemen composing the committee different views upon the general subject, similar to those which have been represented here by amendments offered to the resolution as reported. It was thought by some gentlemen that the time had come when it was important that we should give to Great Britain immediate notice of abrogation, to take effect as soon as possible by the terms of the treaty. It was thought by others that all that we were called upon to do was to ask a proper revision of the treaty, and to direct that commissioners should be appointed in order that the treaty, where it operated injuriously to us, should be revised. There were others who thought that the true course for us to take—and I confess that I was of that number—would be to state frankly and distinctly that while we were disposed to have the provisions of the treaty revised, we yet did not believe that it was consistent with our interests that the treaty in its present form should be continued, and that unless it was revised it must be abrogated. On the whole, it was believed that the form in which the resolution is now presented would be the true one for us to adopt, and although it may be that the members of the committee have not given way and yielded the preferences which they had before, yet the resolution comes reported from the committee with the consent of all its members who were present when final action was taken.

It will be seen from the terms of the resolution that the President is called upon, as soon as it can be done within the terms of the treaty, to give notice of abrogation; that it is not left discretionary, but that he is "authorized and required" to do it. I ought to say that I am informed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] who spoke yesterday, that it is his intention to offer an amendment leaving it discretionary with the President, and not altering the resolution otherwise. But as the resolution stands it makes it imperative upon the President, as soon as it can be done according to the terms of the treaty, to give notice of abrogation. Very well, sir; then when the time has elapsed which must elapse before the abrogation can take effect, by the terms of the resolution that abrogation will be perfect unless before that time a new convention shall be formed which will put this whole matter of the treaty upon grounds mutually satisfactory.

Now, in order that there may be no time lost, in order that unless there is a revision within a year the treaty shall be abrogated, the resolution goes on to provide that the President is to appoint commissioners, but they are not to act unless within a year it shall be signified in some proper form by Great Britain that that Government is disposed to enter upon the formation of a new and satisfactory treaty. If it is so disposed, and if within a year that treaty can be made, then I suppose no one of us would object, unless it be these gentlemen who believe that we had better have no treaty at all. I was surprised, therefore, the other day, when the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] thought it right to say that the resolution which the Committee on Commerce had reported was a resolution begging Great Britain for a treaty. I think the gentleman had not read the terms of the resolution, or he would have been unwilling to make that statement from his place here. So far from that, it will operate to abrogate the treaty unless Great Britain shall signify her desire to have it revised, and unless within a year commissioners shall succeed in revising it satisfactorily; otherwise the treaty is abrogated.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there are any gentlemen upon the floor of this House who do not desire any treaty, they will vote against this resolution. I understand that that is the case so far as my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is concerned, who has offered an amendment to the resolution. Sir, we have had memorials and petitions and representations and resolutions from our constituents in different parts of the country in regard to this subject, all of which have been referred to the Committee on Commerce; and I have yet to see the first one that has requested us to give notice of a peremptory abrogation of this treaty.

I have caused to be made out a statement of the memorials and resolutions that have come before the Committee on Commerce. It is as follows:

Illinois.

Chicago. Board of Trade, February 10, 1862, states that the "treaty has been of great value to the producing interest of the whole Northwest." Says that "we should not check the energy nor circumscribe the industry of our country, but take a broad national view of the question, and firmly advocate the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number." "Cannot recommend any measure that will in the least cripple the energies of our people, but cheerfully advocate the revision of the treaty, if any of its parts are unjust or oppressive." "What we desire is to make our trade still more reciprocal, still more free with our Canadian neighbors."

Massachusetts.

Boston. Board of Trade, March 7, 1864, "resolved that the continuance of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 between the United States and Great Britain, as the same may be revised in certain particulars by commissioners of the two high contracting parties, is of great moment to both countries, and is demanded by the principles of human brotherhood as well as by the interests of American commerce."

Minnesota.

Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce at St. Paul, referred to the Committee on Commerce, February 5, 1862, invokes the "sober second thought" of the country on the subject of our continental policy; reiterates the "uniform utterance of the authorities and citizens of Minnesota" in anticipating "an adjustment of the relations of the United States and all the British provinces on this continent upon a basis of mutual interest and good-will;" does "not deny the expediency of a revision of existing stipulations, but always in the interest of further freedom, not additional restriction of commercial intercourse."

Wisconsin.

Chamber of Commerce at Milwaukee, January 13, 1864, desires "such action as shall result in securing a new treaty founded upon the true principles of reciprocity between the two Governments and the people of both countries, and which shall obviate the objections and inequalities existing in the present treaty, and be upon a more liberal and enlarged basis."

Residents of Oconto county, Wisconsin, and other memorialists, forty-three in number, pray that the treaty may be so "modified" as either to prevent the admission of lumber from Canada, or that a tax may be laid thereon.

This comprises all the memorials, it is believed, referred for several years last past to the Committee on Commerce, or presented to Congress, on "reciprocity," but the Legislature of New York passed resolutions complaining of Canadian legislation since the treaty, and affirming that the full and free development of all the natural advantages of the United States and the British provinces was for the benefit of each, and urged the appointment of commissioners to secure that result. Cleveland and Detroit are in favor of an extension of the treaty, and through their boards of trade have expressed themselves to that effect.

Resolutions of the State of New York.

Concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York in relation to the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, commonly known as the reciprocity treaty.

Whereas, under the treaty made by the United States with Great Britain, on behalf of the British North American colonies, for the purpose of extending reciprocal commerce, nearly all the articles which Canada has to sell are admitted into the United States free of duty, while heavy duties are now imposed upon many of those articles which the United States have to sell with the intention of excluding the United States from the Canadian markets, as avowed by the minister of finance and other gentlemen holding high official positions in Canada; and similar legislation with the same official avowal has been adopted by the imposition of discriminating tolls and duties in favor of an isolating and exclusive policy against our merchants and forwarders, meant and intending to destroy the natural effects of the treaty, and contrary to its spirit; and whereas we believe that free commercial intercourse between the United States and the British North American provinces and possessions, developing the natural, geographical, and other advantages of each, for the good of all, is conducive to the present interest of each, and is the only proper basis of our intercourse for all time to come; and whereas the President of the United States, in the first session of the Thirty-Sixth Congress, caused to be submitted to the House of Representatives an official report, setting forth the gross inequality and injustice existing in our present intercourse with Canada, subversive of the true intent of the treaty, owing to the subsequent legislation of Canada; and whereas the first effects of a system of retaliation or reprisal would injure that portion of Canada known as the Upper Province, whose people have never failed in their efforts to secure a permanent and just policy for their own country and ourselves, in accordance with the desire officially expressed by Lord Napier when British minister at Washington, for the "confirmation and expansion of free commercial relations between the United States and British provinces;" Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of New York are requested to take such steps, either by the appointment of commissioners to confer with persons properly appointed on behalf of Canada, or by such other means as may seem most expedient, to protect the interests of the United States from the said unequal and unjust system of commerce now existing, and to regulate the commerce and navigation between her Majesty's possessions in North America and United States in such manner as to render the same reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory, as was intended and expressed by the treaty. And

Resolved, That the foregoing preamble and resolutions be transmitted to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, with a request that they be presented to both Houses thereof.

No one has asked the abrogation of this treaty. The Legislature of Maine—which passed the strongest resolutions that I have seen on this subject—in its last action, as I am informed, adopted a resolution calling on Congress to see that a proper revision of the treaty should be made, but not that the treaty shall be abrogated.

The treaty has undoubtedly, in some respects, operated adversely, not because of any of its own provisions, but because of action outside the treaty itself. There are, in fact, as gentlemen know, seven parties to this treaty. The United States and Great Britain are the two great contracting parties, but besides them are Canada, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward's Island, Newfoundland, and New Brunswick. Each of these provinces has its own tariff. Each regulates its own finances by its own laws, and only owes political allegiance to the Government of Great Britain. One of these parties, and only one, that is Canada, has adopted a tariff system which is in its operations adverse to our interest. It does not violate the letter of the treaty, but it is inconsistent with those friendly relations that it was supposed would exist between the two Governments if the treaty were ratified.

The treaty contains a schedule of free articles. Those articles are of the growth or the produce of the two countries. The treaty does not embrace the manufactures of either country, or articles of foreign growth. As to all these matters—manufactures and articles of foreign growth—the two Governments might legislate, or either of the provincial legislatures might take action as to them respectively might seem right. Very soon after the treaty went into operation it was found that in Canada there was legislation adverse to us, the direct result of which was to injure our interests and to benefit the home country. The effect of that has been to reduce our exports to Canada of manufactured goods from $4,185,516 in 1858-59 to $1,510,802 in 1862-63. The ad valorem system adopted by Canada, levying duties on the value of merchandise at the last place of purchase, and also the discrimination with reference to the different routes over which merchandise was to pass, have, beyond doubt, operated greatly to our prejudice. Gentlemen will see at once that a cargo of foreign goods can be placed within the control of Canadian consumers at a cheaper price, provided the duties are levied on these goods at the English valuation, than if levied at their valuation at New York or Boston, after the duties are paid and incidental expenses incurred. There is no doubt, in my opinion, that if such legislation had been supposed or anticipated no such treaty as is now in force could have been ratified until provision had been made in it protecting us against such adverse action. It ought not to be forgotten, however, that this adverse action has come from Canada alone. None of the other provincial governments have followed her example, and I have yet to learn that any dissatisfaction has grown out of the legislative action of either of the other provinces.

Now, it is within the possibility of things that a treaty may be ratified not including Canada. We know perfectly well how very much larger the proportion of our business with Canada is than with the other provinces. Nevertheless, we do know that this treaty itself was when formed designed to be operative without Newfoundland, and that it applied to Newfoundland on condition. There is no difficulty, no impossibility in the way of a treaty which shall embrace Canada on condition.

But it seems to me, in view of the facts which gentlemen will find embodied in the reports from the Committee on Commerce in 1862 and during this year, in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in the volume containing the abstract of the last census; that it would be most unwise to adopt any such plan as that proposed by the gentleman from Vermont. And to give notice to the Government of Great Britain peremptorily abrogating this treaty, without signifying in any way our willingness or desire to have the treaty revised or put upon a proper basis, would indicate what perhaps the gentleman from Vermont wants, that we desire to have no treaty at all. I can scarcely understand by what reasons the gentleman has been brought to that conclusion. I know that Vermont grows wool, and that wool is a free article under the present treaty, and the argument may be that the introduction of Canadian wool might interfere with the interests of the wool-growers of this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if that were a fact, which I hardly think can be maintained, I should be right sorry if my eloquent friend from Vermont should succeed in drawing over the eyes of the House so much wool that we could see nothing but sheep, [laughter;] but I take issue with him, and from information derived from personal conversation with parties who know the practical operations of this treaty, as well as from official documents, I have no reason to believe that Vermont wool would be less profitable to the farmer if the Canadian supply were not so free.

Why, sir, the wool that is grown in Canada and sent to this country does not and cannot compete with that grown in the State of Vermont. The Vermont wool, as my friend knows very well, is short and fine, of a superior quality, while that grown in Canada is long and coarse. That is unfit for clothing, it is fit only for worsted. The Vermont wool comes from sheep that mean wool; the Vermont farmers raise their sheep for the wool's sake, while the Canadian farmers raise their sheep for the mutton, and take the wool such as it is. We buy a great deal of foreign wool; we import wool from Buenos Ayres. That also is of a coarse character, not coming into competition with the finer wools that are raised under the care and expense that have been bestowed in Vermont and other States upon our sheep. The fleece of the Vermont sheep has been growing heavier and heavier for the last quarter of a century. It did not use to average more than two pounds, now it will average scarcely less than four pounds. It would not pay our farmers to raise the sheep from which Canadian wool is taken. We have not raised wool enough for our own use, and we cannot at present raise enough for our consumption. In 1860 we worked up in the United States 80,000,000 pounds of wool; of that we raised 60,500,000 pounds; that is to say we fell short of the demand in the raw material 19,500,000 pounds.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask my friend from Massachusetts a question. He says we manufactured last year 80,000,000 pounds of wool.

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir; I said 1860.

Mr. MORRILL. And that we produced 60,000,000 pounds. Now, the facts are that we raised last year 74,000,000 pounds. If, then, we manufactured 80,000,000 pounds, I would like to know where we have a market for 19,500,000 pounds of imported wool?

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman from Vermont, in reply to a statement I made for 1860, puts me a question in reference to last year. Now, if the gentleman will permit me to finish my statement, I think I will satisfy him of its consistency. I have taken the last year, of which we have census returns, 1860, and I say that for that year we worked up 80,000,000 pounds, while we raised but 60,500,000 pounds. We sent to Canada the same year 222,000 pounds; and we had, therefore, to buy for our own purposes that year about 19,722,000 pounds of wool. We brought from Canada that year 1,000,000 pounds, leaving us still between eighteen and nineteen million pounds short.

Now, sir, I cannot answer the gentleman's question as to the facts this year. I cannot tell how much wool we have worked up this year. There has been a largely increased demand for wool because of this rebellion. I speak of the general course of that business, and I say that we cannot now raise by millions of pounds wool enough for our own consumption.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly, if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. STEVENS. If we have to import it, ought we not to import it from some country that will allow a duty on it?

Mr. ELIOT. That is a question growing out of another consideration, and that is our need for money. We import it from Canada free. If the argument be that we had better import it from a country that will pay a duty it will bring us to this, that we had better not have any reciprocal treaties with any country on earth. The argument proves too much; it goes against a treaty of any kind, because we want money now.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman believe that the treaty-making power of this Government has the right to regulate commerce?

Mr. ELIOT. To answer that question will make it necessary for me to go into an examination of the constitutional question, which would run deep into my time. I do not want to discuss that question. We have the treaty made; the treaty is here, whether or not the parties had the constitutional right to make it. Now, the gentleman will not deny that we have the constitutional right to pass the resolution reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] stated the other day that this treaty was a failure so far as the fishing interest is concerned. He put it upon two grounds: first, that it was quite as well, if not better, that our fishermen should fish beyond the three miles from land, which we had the right to do before the treaty; and secondly, because of the great increase in the price of the articles used in the fishing business, that is to say, leads, nets, and everything on board fishing vessels. For these reasons the gentleman holds the treaty to be a failure. He introduced letters which had been addressed to him by two of his fishermen correspondents; and I beg to call the attention of the House to the extracts in the gentleman's speech. I cannot read the whole as given in the Globe, but members will find that the objections which are named do not grow out of the treaty at all, but out of the state of facts which has arisen since the formation of the treaty, that is to say, the rebellion in which we are now engaged. This is the statement to which I refer:

"The reciprocity treaty operates against the fishing interest. It would be an advantage to the fishing interest to have it abolished, with an understanding that a tariff should be put on foreign fish. The privilege of fishing in-shore in common with the English is duly appreciated by us who are in the business, as the annoyance and loss of vessels under the three-mile restriction was troublesome and hard to bear. But things have entirely changed since the treaty was made. In 1854 the duties were only nominal, and they were so small that it did not make much difference whether they were continued or not; and for the purpose of getting clear of the three-mile restriction we thought we had better let foreign fish come in. But although just now the importation is checked on account of the high price of exchange, as soon as that resumes its usual course free foreign fish will drive us entirely out of the market. Salt is now worth with them $1 50 per hoghead; with us, $4 50. Cod-lines, leads, duck, nets, everything that we use on board of our vessels, and the materials of which our vessels are built, cost about in the same proportion, or nearly so. All of us thought, in 1854, that fighting had ceased, and tariffs were among the things that had gone by. This rebellion brings about a new order of things. With us it is taxes, taxes. While we are taxed on everything that we see, smell, or taste, and very properly, too, should the provincials have our markets open to them and invited to come in without taxation? It is most certainly for the interest of the fisheries that the treaty should be repealed."

It was supposed in 1854 that there would be no tariff and no taxes, and that foreign fish might come in free; but by reason of existing facts and because of the rebellion it would be to the interest of the fishermen to have the treaty abrogated. The view taken here may be somewhat selfish, but it is a frank view nevertheless, because it puts the objection to the treaty on fair ground, and on that ground we should not make any treaty, as we are now in a position where we want money. But the object of the treaty as it concerned the fisheries was to confer and adjust rights. That has not failed.

The history of the questions connected with the fisheries, which were so debated and had so nearly involved us in war, ought to be in the mind of every gentleman who wants to discuss the abrogation of this reciprocity treaty.

The gentleman says that fish might be taken as well outside as within three miles from the land. I will not stop to discuss that. I remember to have heard that some years ago fishermen along a short strip of coast, not more than twelve miles, on what was known as Fox Island thoroughfare, succeeded in taking not less than five hundred thousand barrels in one season.

But no matter about that question. The treaty settles certain national rights, rights which we have always regarded as of the utmost importance. It is not Massachusetts, it is not Maine alone, that is concerned, but it is the nation at large. There are rights which we cannot surrender, and there is no man upon this floor who would advocate their surrender. You cannot abandon them, and since the first treaty of peace in 1783, we have always insisted upon them. During the time which intervened between the date of that treaty and the convention of 1818 there were differences which grew up in regard to our rights, and war had come in between those two dates. And when the treaty of peace between this country and Great Britain, after the war of 1812, was about to be made, a difference between our plenipotentiaries and those of Great Britain in regard to this question presented itself at once. I have caused to be taken some extracts from a valuable report made by Mr. Sabine upon the subject of the fisheries. Mr. Sabine is a gentleman who lived a number of years in the State of Maine, and devoted great attention to the subject. He has given us some valuable aid, and I ask attention to this history of the controversy which was settled by the treaty of 1854.

By the treaty of 1783 our first fishing rights were secured. But it was contended that the war of 1812 had annulled and destroyed them. During the war the distant fishing grounds were abandoned. "The British colonists determined that we should never occupy them more. The duties which devolved on Messrs. Adams, Clay, Gallatin, Bayard, and Russell, the American commissioners at Ghent, were consequently difficult and arduous. On the one hand, they were expected to arrange conditions of peace, and yet were instructed, in terms which admitted of no discretion, to break off their consultations and return home rather than allow the subject of surrendering the fisheries to come under discussion; on the other hand, the British plenipotentiaries met them with the doctrine that the privileges were entirely destroyed by hostilities. Said the late President Adams:

"These gentlemen, after commencing the negotiations with the loftiest pretensions of conquest, finally settled down into the determination to keep Moose Island and the fisheries to themselves. This was the object of their deepest solicitude. Their efforts to obtain our acquiescence in their pretensions, that the fishing liberties had been forfeited by the war, were unavailing. They presented it to us in every form that ingenuity could devise. It was the first stumbling-block and the last obstacle to the conclusion of the treaty."

In the course of the negotiations "Mr. Adams suggested to his associates, and Mr. Clay embodied in a proposition to be presented to the British commissioners, the principle that we held our rights of fishing by the same tenure that we did our independence; that, unlike another class of treaties, the treaty of 1783 is to be regarded as perpetual, and of the nature of a deed, in which the fisheries are an appurtenant of the soil conveyed or parted with, and that, therefore, no stipulation was necessary or desirable to secure the perpetuity of the appendage more than of the territory itself. In other words, if we must contract anew for fishing grounds, so must we also obtain a new title to our territories. This, as I understand it, is the substance of the proposition itself, and of the various discussions of which from time to time it formed the basis. The position was impregnable."

But the treaty was concluded without a recognition of this view, and, in 1815, "the commander of his Majesty's ship-of-war the Jasseur, heeding the clamors of the colonists more than the qualified instructions of the admiralty, commenced the seizure of our fishing vessels; and in one day in June of that year sent no less than eight into the port of Halifax as lawful prizes. This outrage, and the right assumed by the commander of this ship to warn our fishermen not to come within sixty miles of the coast, (as elsewhere remarked,) led to negotiations and to the convention of 1818. Mr. Baker, the British chargé d'affaires, in reply to Mr. Monroe's note of July 18, 1815, declared that the commander of the Jasseur had transcended his authority, and gave the assurance that orders had been transmitted to the naval officers on the Halifax and Newfoundland stations which would "prevent the recurrence of any similar interruption;" but the schooner Nabby was seized by his Majesty's ship Saracen, Captain Gore, and proceedings in the admiralty court of Nova Scotia were instituted against her in August, 1818, only two months before the convention was concluded. Eleven other American vessels were seized by Captain Chambers, under orders from Admiral Milne, for alleged violations of British maritime jurisdiction."

The convention of 1818 quieted the discontents for a season. But that treaty contained a renunciation which has been alluded to by the gentleman from Maine, and an unfair construction of the words occasioned fresh and bitter controversy.

This was the clause in the treaty:

"And the United States hereby renounce forever the liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry, or cure fish, on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter, and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them."

"The distinguishing features of this article, compared with the stipulations of the treaty of 1783, are obviously two: first, that we gave up the catching along certain shores; and secondly, that our facilities of drying and curing were increased. The practical construction of both Governments" was, at first, that "our vessels could fish everywhere, as under the treaty of 1783, except within three miles of certain coasts; in other words, that our rights were not impaired on the southern shore of Newfoundland, between Cape Ray and the Rameau islands, on the western and northern shores of Newfoundland, from said Cape Ray to the Quirpon islands, at the Magdalen islands, between Mount Joly and the Straits of Belleisle, and through these straits to an indefinite extent along the shores of Labrador; while elsewhere in British America we retained the sea fisheries, but surrendered the inner or shore fisheries."

"The four years succeeding the ratification of the convention were years of comparative quiet and security. But in 1823 the ships-of-war Argus and Sparrowhawk spread alarm among our fishermen who were employed in the Bay of Fundy, and elsewhere in the waters of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. They molested some and ruined the voyages of others; but the Charles of York, Maine—a prize to the Argus—is believed to be the only vessel captured and sent into port for trial.

"In 1824 Captain Hoare, of his Majesty's brig Dotterel, seized nine vessels. The conduct of this gentleman caused much excitement and indignation. I personally witnessed many of his proceedings. However censurable his general course, it is not remembered that he disturbed the humble men who fish in small open boats in the bay of Passamaquoddy, and in waters always considered free and common to the people of the two flags. Of the vessels which he captured, one was retaken by her crew, assisted by one of his own men, and two others were rescued by their crews, aided by an armed party from Eastport.

"Early in 1826 the Dotterel was again the terror of our fishermen. The presence of the United States sloop-of-war Lexington, Captain Shubrick, under orders to cruise upon the fishing grounds, relieved their fears; and the season passed away without any serious disturbance. But there had been no adjustment of the difficulties which occurred in 1824."

Without referring to some comparatively unimportant differences we come to the year 1839.

"These seizures in the course of the year were numerous. The Java, Battelle, Mayflower, Charles, Eliza, Shedland, Hyder Ali, Independence, Hart, Ocean, Director, Atlas, Magnolia, Amazon, and Three Brothers were among the number. Her Majesty's cruisers spread consternation on the fishing-grounds throughout the season. Hon. Keith Stewart, in command of the Ringdove, was as much dreaded by our fishermen in the Bay of Fundy as Captain Hoare had been, in the Dotterel, in the year 1824. In July a gentleman of one of the frontier ports of Maine informed an official personage at Washington that four or five hundred American fishing vessels were then in that bay; that the complaints of the colonists of the island of Grand Menan had caused the commanders of the British cruisers to refuse shelter to our flag even in stormy weather; that nearly one hundred of our vessels, which had been driven from positions secured to them by the treaty, had fled for refuge to a single harbor on the American side of the line; and that our fishermen were generally armed, and would not bear the indignities to which they were exposed. He added that 'they can furnish some thousands of as fearless men as can be found anywhere, at short notice; and unless our Government send an armed vessel without delay you will shortly hear of bloodshed.' Such was the condition of things, now well remembered, at and near the border. Elsewhere there was so much difficulty and excitement that the masters of our vessels, whether at sea or at anchor, felt themselves unsafe; and, molested along the entire coast of Nova Scotia, many of them adjusted their affairs at the close of the season without reward for their toil and exposure, and in sadness of spirit as to the future. In a word, there seemed to persons of calm judgment a determination on the part of colonial politicians to drive our countrymen to extremities. To exclude us from the bays of Fundy and Chaleurs and other large bays by lines drawn from headland to headland; to deny to us resort to the colonial ports and harbors for shelter and to procure wood and water, except in cases of actual distress; to dispute our right to fish on the shores of the Magdalen islands, and thus to render the treaty stipulation valueless; and to close against us the Strait of Canso, and of consequence to compel us to make the dangerous voyage around the island of Cape Breton, when bound to or from the Gulf of St. Lawrence, are among the pretensions of Nova Scotia seriously asserted in the memorable year 1839. The seizures of our vessels and the other proceedings which we have briefly noticed attracted the attention of our Government, and the United States schooner Grampus, under the command of Lieutenant John S. Paine, was dispatched to the scene of alarm and commotion. Lieutenant Paine informed himself of the matters in dispute and performed his duty with zeal and efficiency."

I omit the history of the next six years.

"The events of 1845 were highly interesting and important. The colonists had apparently accomplished their long-cherished plans. The opinion of the Crown lawyers in 1841; the declaration of Lord Stanley in 1842, that our Government 'practically acquiesced' in the new construction of the convention; and the capture of the Washington in 1843, for an infringement of that construction, and for no other offense whatever, were all calculated to impress them with the belief that the contest was at an end. Such, I confess, was the inclination of my own mind. My home was on the frontier; I was a dealer in the products of the sea, and was in the daily transaction of business with fishermen of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and was well advised of the measures which were adopted by the colonists from time to time to induce the ministry at home to sustain their pretensions. The zeal which was manifested by those who managed the British side of the case, and the seeming apathy of the American press and the American people; the rumors from the Government House at Halifax, and the want of all information from the White House at Washington, gave rise to much alarm. Official silence on our part was at last broken; and such of our citizens as were engaged in the fisheries, or were otherwise involved in the issue of the controversy, were astounded, in June, at the following paragraph which appeared in the Union, a newspaper supposed to enjoy the confidence of our Government, and said, in the popular sentiment, to be its 'organ.' Said that paper:

"We are gratified to be now enabled to state that a dispatch has been recently received at the Department of State from Mr. Everett, our minister at London, with which he transmits a note from Lord Aberdeen containing the satisfactory intelligence that, after a reconsideration of the subject, although the Queen's Government adhere to the construction of the convention which they have always maintained, they have still come to the determination of relaxing from it, so far as to allow American fishermen to pursue their avocations in any part of the Bay of Fundy, provided they do not approach—except in the cases specified in the treaty of 1818—within three miles of the entrance of any bay on the coast of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick.

"This is an important concession, not merely as removing an occasion of frequent and unpleasant disagreement between the two Governments, but as reopening to our citizens those valuable fishing grounds within the Bay of Fundy which they enjoyed before the war of 1812, but from which, as the British Government has since maintained, they were excluded by the convention of 1818."

"The assertion, from such a source, that the British Government had 'always maintained' the construction of the convention contended for in the 'case' submitted to the Crown lawyers by Lord Falkland, in 1841; the announcement that our vessels were no longer to fish 'within three miles of the entrance of any bay on the coast of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick,' the bay of Fundy alone excepted; the further declaration that the fishing grounds of that bay 'enjoyed before the war of 1812,' and lost to us by that event, were now 'reopened' to us by 'an important concession'—excited the liveliest sensibility, and were regarded in the fishing towns of Maine and Massachusetts with dismay.

"The events of 1846, and of the three succeeding years, will detain us but a moment. The seizure and total loss of several American vessels, and the renewed efforts of the Nova Scotia House of Assembly to close the Strait of Canso, for reasons stated in three annual reports of committees of that body, are the most important, and all which we need notice."

I now come to the year 1851.

"But there is good authority for saying that the British admiral (Seymour) was instructed by the admiralty, in the course of August, to allow our fishermen to pursue their avocation in the Bay of Fundy on the terms of the arrangement of 1845; to allow us to fish at the Magdalen islands, as in former years; to forbear to capture our vessels when more than three miles from the shore, as measured without reference to the 'headlands,' and by the old construction of the convention; and generally to execute his orders with forbearance and moderation. That the British ministry have been disposed, from first to last, to adjust the controversy on honorable terms can hardly be doubted. In 1852, as in 1845, the clamors, remonstrances, and, I will add, the misrepresentations of the colonists, changed their intentions. As at every former time, the politicians of Nova Scotia led off in opposition to a settlement. Early in September a public meeting was called at Halifax which, according to the published report of its proceedings, was attended by persons of all classes and interests, to 'petition her Majesty in regard to the rumored surrender of the rights of fishery secured to British subjects by the convention of 1818.' One gentleman of consideration and influence appears to have 'protested against the utility of the meeting,' but to have been 'promptly checked by his worship the mayor,' who presided. Several merchants were present, but performed a secondary part. The political leaders had everything their own way."

"There is now but little to add to complete a record of the more important events connected with the history of this controversy."

"The Queen of England, in her speech at the opening of Parliament, November, 1852, remarked that—

"The present and well-grounded complaints on the part of my North American colonies of the infraction by the citizens of the United States of the fishery convention of 1818 induced me to dispatch, for the protection of their interests, a class of vessels better adapted to the service than those which had been previously employed. This step has led to discussion with the Government of the United States; and while the rights of my subjects have been firmly maintained, the friendly spirit in which the question has been treated induces me to hope that the ultimate result may be a mutually beneficial extension and improvement of our commercial intercourse with the great Republic."

The paper written by Mr. Webster in July, 1852, and the debate in the Senate during the summer of that year, will be remembered.

I have now given from Mr. Sabine's valuable report a statement of the material facts concerning the fisheries, before the reciprocity treaty of 1854. The first article of the treaty is as follows:

"It is agreed by the high contracting parties that in addition to the liberty secured to the United States fishermen by the above-mentioned convention of October 20, 1818, of taking, curing, and drying fish on certain coasts of the British North American colonies therein defined, the inhabitants of the United States shall have, in common with the subjects of her Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the sea-coasts and shores, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks of Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward's Island, and of the several islands thereunto adjacent, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the coasts and shores of those colonies and the islands thereof, and also upon the Magdalen islands, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish: Provided, That in so doing they do not interfere with the rights of private property, or with British fishermen in the peaceable use of any part of the said coast in their occupancy for the same purpose."

"It is understood that the above-mentioned liberty applies solely to the sea fishery, and that the salmon and shad fisheries, and all fisheries in rivers and mouths of rivers, are hereby reserved exclusively for British fishermen."

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] argued that the treaty had been a "business failure." But it brought to a settlement all the controverted questions which until then had troubled the two Governments, which had excited our people, which had occasioned collision upon the waters, and which had brought the two Governments within sight of war.

If this treaty shall not be revised—and I assume that if Great Britain does not indicate her desire for a revision it will be abrogated—and put it into shape satisfactory to us all, we shall have to meet again the same questions; and then my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and my friend from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] and those gentlemen here who are in favor of abrogating the treaty, will be as ready as any of us to stand up for the rights of American citizens—rights which we have had secured since 1783—for it will then become a question in which the pride and patriotism of the gentlemen, as Americans, will be enlisted.

The gentleman from Maine says if the fishermen violate the treaty of 1818 they must take the consequences. But it is not they alone that have to bear the consequences. 'It is the nation! And I do not desire, unless it shall be necessary, to have renewed discussions of questions under the treaty of 1818, upon which we cannot agree, and which must lead to collision or to a new treaty. If they violate the treaty of 1818 let them suffer, the gentleman argues. But they never admitted that they violated it. That was the question. They claimed they had a right to fish where they were seized; and our Government, in many cases, upheld them; and the question was one of fact and of construction.

The question was, where was the line? The only way to ascertain the point, as gentlemen will see, would be to drop a buoy at the precise spot where the seizure was made, and carry a line from that to the nearest headland in order to ascertain whether it was three miles or more from land. The question, in fact, was whether they were fishing where they had a right to fish. Upon that point, all those who were interested upon our side would testify in one way, while upon the other side it would be contended that they were fishing inside of the proper line. The question of fact would have to be settled, and then the question of law would have to be settled as to the construction of the treaty of 1818.

At one time it was supposed the Government had abandoned the ground we took upon that treaty in its earliest years. But I apprehend that will not be found to be the case, and that both the fact and the law will come in question again.

I say these rights cannot be surrendered, and those questions cannot be determined between the two Governments except by a renewed treaty or by war.

Mr. PIKE. I desire to ask the gentleman whether during the whole time the treaty was in operation, from 1818 to 1854, there were not numerous seizures made, beginning as early as 1823, and whether there is any more likelihood of war hereafter from that source than there was during that period of thirty years?

Mr. ELIOT. There were seizures made, and if the gentleman had listened to my remarks he would have heard me speak of seizures between 1818 and 1854. If the same questions are to be passed upon we shall be just so much nearer war, because we have gone over the negotiations once and gone over them unsuccessfully.

Mr. PIKE. I would ask the gentleman further, whether twenty-five vessels were not, from time to time, seized and condemned without interference from the Government?

Mr. ELIOT. That does not touch the argument at all. It only shows that in those particular cases the seizures were correct, and that the gentleman's constituents violated the law and suffered the consequences.

Now, whether these fishermen care to fish within a quarter of a mile of land or not is an unimportant question at this time.

But let the vessels of these gentlemen whose letters their able Representative has read be seized on the ocean, fishing, as they will contend, more than three miles from land, but within three miles, as the captor vessel will contend, then what? We know what from past history. No matter who owns these vessels, nor from what region upon the seaboard he may have come, if he is the humblest citizen that owes allegiance to this Government our nation stands pledged to maintain his rights; for his rights become yours and mine, and they cannot be trampled upon with impunity.

But is it not wise, when exciting questions have been adjusted as these have been by this reciprocity treaty, to avoid their renewed discussion if Great Britain is disposed to revise this treaty and to renew it? If she is not disposed, then, I say, let the consequences come.

The gentleman from Vermont and the gentleman from Maine have, however, adduced some arguments to which I wish to reply. Both of these gentlemen contend and believe that the treaty will have been in operation ten years in September of this year. If that is so, then, in order to have the benefit of the year, notice of abrogation should be given this fall. I cannot agree to that view. The final proclamation of the President was made March 16, 1855, (United States Statutes, volumeten, page 1173,) and it may be well doubted whether the treaty "came into operation" before then. But that is not of consequence now. The President, if this resolution shall now pass, will be guided by his own judgment, aided by his official advisers, and will not give the notice until the period of ten years shall have passed.

But the gentleman from Vermont argues that there has been no reciprocity at all, and the gentleman from Maine follows up the argument. What reciprocity it is said, is there in sending cotton free into Canada when Canada raises no cotton? What right have we to find fault with that? We have a free market for our cotton, and that I suppose is what we want. But he asks, whose ax is ground because grindstones are permitted to come in free from Canada? We make no grindstones. Well, then, it is not the colonial ax that is ground, surely! The gentleman says:

"What reciprocity is there in making cotton free to the United States from Canada when Canada produces no cotton? 'King Cotton' was in no danger from long staple or short raised north of the forty-fifth degree. Whose ax is ground by making grindstones free to Canada from the United States, when the United States are mainly dependent upon the British provinces for their own supplies? What equality is there in exchanging the grain and cattle markets of New York and Boston for those of Montreal and Quebec, when the former in their normal condition are twenty-five per cent. better than the latter, and when the latter under no circumstances can be available to the United States? What is the advantage of free trade in lumber with a country whose forests are inexhaustible and coeval with the world?"

But the markets of Montreal and of Canada generally are available to the United States. So far as the article of cattle is concerned, although we have imported more animals than we have sent to them, nevertheless we sent to them in 1855 an amount worth $207,586; and between 1855 and 1862 we have sent values varying from $473,697 in 1856 to $347,936 in 1862. So far, then, as any complaint in this respect against the reciprocity treaty is concerned, it must rest upon the ground indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] that we had better import these articles from countries where we can impose a duty upon them. But it is said that our forests are inexhaustible, and that we do not want lumber from the provinces. That is not true at the North, I apprehend. I think the gentleman from Maine will not deny that the Ashburton treaty opened to this country the last untouched forest in New England. I have a communication upon this subject from Mr. Sabine, who has been officially engaged and speaks from knowledge, and to which I will call the attention of the House. He says:

"In 1852 I was appointed agent of the Treasury Department, for the special purpose of making a minute examination of the region on the upper waters of the river St. John and its tributaries, and this service was rendered. Nothing necessary to the faithful performance of the duty assigned to me was neglected. I discoursed freely with loggers, sawyers, river drivers, &c., to obtain the information which Mr. Corwin wished, touching the operation of that treaty, [the Ashburton treaty.] I was amazed at the extent of the business which had origin only nine or ten years previously. Since that time, large mills have been erected near the city of St. John at the mouth of the river, by several of my old friends in Maine. The members of Congress from that State, whatever their opinion upon the continuance of the reciprocity treaty, will tell you that though spruce and hemlock trees are still sufficient for the present, pines fit for doors, casing, and the general finish of buildings are becoming scarce on the St. Croix, Machias, Penobscot, Kennebec, and the Saco. At the West the case is quite different, as I well know, for Chicago has supplanted Bangor as the capital of Lumberdom."

So far as this article of lumber is concerned, the West will find more than compensation for any loss (if any has been occasioned, which I do not believe,) in the benefits otherwise derived from the treaty.

It is said that by this treaty "the ancient laws of trade have been subverted, and our exports to Canada, which formerly largely exceeded our imports, are now greatly less. They sell to us but go elsewhere to buy." The Secretary of the Treasury tells a very different story. During the ten years prior to 1863 we exported to Canada values to the amount of $170,635,000. During that same time we imported from Canada $152,051,000. We sold to them in excess of what they sold to us $18,584,000.

Our annual sales exceeded our annual purchases by $1,858,400. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] has given in his speech a tabular statement from which it would appear that we have imported from the whole of these provinces less than we have exported, during the existence of this treaty, to the amount of $56,774,000. And yet it is said that they sell to us but go elsewhere to buy. Why, sir, the fact is that they buy more from us than they do from all the rest of the world together. From 1855 to 1860 (inclusive) the entire imports into Canada were $215,982,776. Of that aggregate $114,259,345 were imports from the United States, and from all other countries $101,723,431; so that during that time Canada bought of us more than she did from all other countries to the amount of $12,535,914, equal to $2,089,319 annually.

The gentleman from Vermont refers to our exports of coin. He says:

"The amount of our export of coin for this year I have been unable to ascertain, but Canadian returns credit us in 1862 with $2,530,000, and in 1863 with $3,502,180. That it was much more there can be no reasonable doubt. The fair inference would be that not less than $10,000,000 are annually drawn from us in gold, or its equivalent, to pay for agricultural productions not required, and to glut markets which our own people are all the while eager to supply. We have no reciprocity treaty with any other country, and no other presents so unfavorable a balance sheet. Even our trade with China is more profitable."

From this it would appear that the balance of trade is largely against us. But I have shown that to the end of the year 1863—the fiscal year—Canada had in ten years bought of us $18,500,000 more than we bought of her. Have we suffered a drain of $10,000,000 in gold, or its equivalent, as the fruits of reciprocity? Our exports to Canada in 1863 were $19,898,718, our imports were $18,816,999, showing a balance in our favor of $1,081,719. And what is the fact as to gold—are coin remittances all one way? It would seem to be so from the argument. But the same tables to which I have referred show that although we did export as it was said in 1863 coin to the amount of $3,502,180, we imported in that same year in coin $4,892,195, showing a balance in our favor of $1,590,015, and nearly all of that was due to us to pay for the difference between our exports and our imports.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman will allow me to say that his statement applies to all the provinces, while mine applied only to the Canadas.

Mr. ELIOT. We find from the statistical tables furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury that since the treaty has been in operation we have sold to the British provinces nearly twenty-six and a half millions more than they have sold to us. Within eight years we have sold to Canada nearly twenty-three million bushels of wheat and have bought from them somewhat less than twenty-one million bushels. Our western and central grain-growers have been benefited, for it happens that the Canadians prefer the grain of Illinois and Wisconsin. They know there is grit somewhere in Illinois and Wisconsin, but they believe the grit is in the people and not in the grain.

During the five years before 1861, we have sent to all the provinces $6,000,000 in breadstuffs more than we have received from them. And yet the gentleman says that the Canadians go elsewhere to buy.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] says that this treaty has affected our commercial and shipping interests adversely because the carrying trade is done in colonial bottoms and not in American bottoms. If he will look at the report made this year by the Committee on Commerce, he will see that from 1856 to 1861 there were entered in our ports from Canadian provinces ten million tons of American tonnage and six million tons of foreign tonnage; and that there were cleared to Canada at the same time ten million tons of American tonnage and seven millions of foreign tonnage.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts would wish to be corrected on this subject, and I desire to correct him. The statement he quotes shows the amount of stuff transported over our railroads and not in vessels. The gentleman will find that there were no other means of making up the tables than to include what is carried on railroads as well as in vessels.

Mr. ELIOT. I must refer the gentleman to the report from which I take the statement. But I will annex the statement itself.

The following table shows the nationality of the vessels employed in the carrying trade between the United States and the British North American provinces during the last five years:

It cannot be fairly denied by any one who examines the facts officially within our reach that so much advantage has accrued to us from the treaty that it is the part of wisdom to connect with a notice of abrogation an expression of willingness to renew upon terms mutually satisfactory. There can be no doubt that continued peace between the two Governments requires some treaty adjustment of questions imperfectly adjusted in 1818. The navigation of the St. Lawrence and of the St. John ought to be free. Our conterminous frontiers, extending a length of from four to five thousand miles, which shows no natural line of division, ought to exhibit no artificial line, unless it may not be fairly avoided. A free enlargement of business intercourse will, in substance and in fact, enlarge our consuming markets. I have already said that I am not willing that this treaty should remain in its present form. It is not possible for these friendly treaty relations to exist between the two Governments while the present illiberal, narrow-minded, and unfriendly laws of Canada are in operation. I am willing to have notice of its abrogation given, to have that notice imperative, and that it shall operate at the end of the year, unless before that time a new treaty be made on terms that shall protect our interests. If Great Britain desires to have a treaty that shall be reciprocal in fact, and such treaty can be arranged, then it seems to me that the best and truest interests of both countries will be subserved.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

NEW SERIES.....No. 156.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, next addressed the House. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. SPALDING. I have the honor, Mr. Speaker, to represent a constituency who have derived, perhaps, as much benefit from the treaty of 1854 as the constituency of any gentleman upon this floor; but, at the same time, they believe it to be anything else than what it purports to be, a treaty of reciprocity. Hence I am in favor of giving the notice contemplated by the terms of the compact, at the close of the "ten years."

I desire for a moment, however, to occupy the attention of this House in taking a broader view of the subject than can be obtained from merely a local stand-point; I desire to consider the question in its national aspects.

And in the first place I claim, notwithstanding the protest of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] that it is legitimate to inquire whether this treaty could ever have been concluded without violating the spirit of the Constitution of the United States; for I insist again, with some of my friends upon the other side of the House, that we still have a Constitution the principles of which should be observed.

The compact or treaty which we are considering purports to be made for the purpose of regulating commerce between the United States and a foreign nation. The Canadian possessions of Great Britain are not to be placed on the footing of one of our own States, although, in many respects, they are so treated by the terms of this contract.

Now, if I read the Constitution correctly, Congress alone has power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations." The President cannot regulate commerce with foreign nations by means of treaties negotiated by his ministers, even if sanctioned by two thirds of the Senate.

Again, the revenue of the United States is concerned in the operation of this treaty; for it dispenses with a tariff on imports in respect to many and indeed almost all the productions of the Canadas, which are brought into this country. It thus indirectly takes from Congress the power to "lay and collect duties and imposts" so far as the productions of the Canadas are concerned, and in that regard I say the treaty militates against the Constitution of the United States.

I do not advance this opinion as my own crude theory alone. I am supported in it by some of the best constitutional lawyers in the country, who have all along, from 1854 to the present time, declared that this treaty was in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, in that it assumed to regulate matters over which Congress had exclusive jurisdiction.

But, sir, passing by this constitutional objection, let us look at the terms of the treaty itself, and then glance at the conduct of the Canadian authorities since its formation. We will find whether it has been regarded by the parties to it as a "reciprocity treaty." The treaty proposes to let into our country nearly all the productions of the Canadas free of duty. It proposes, indeed, to let the same articles pass from the United States into the Canadas free of duty, but the advantage on the part of the Canadas consists in this, that the raw material is the main object of traffic with them. They sell to us the products of their soil, of their forests, and of their fisheries. These all come free of duty. But when we desire to traffic with them in the varied manufactures of the States, we are met with exactions which they have the right to impose, in the shape of a tariff, and the effect has been that from the time that treaty went into operation they have increased their tariff of duties upon our manufactures from sixty-two and a half to one hundred per cent. No man doubts this; and I understand that the ratio of articles of merchandise subjected to duties as between the Canadas and the United States, following out the consequences of this treaty, are as forty-five to one in favor of the Canadas.

It is said that we derive a great benefit from the treaty by having thrown open to us the free navigation of the St. Lawrence river, and by being permitted to navigate the canals of Canada. It is true that by the terms of the treaty we are permitted to navigate the waters of the St. Lawrence river and the navigable canals; the Welland and others, subject to no other restrictions than are imposed upon vessels belonging to British subjects; but how has that part of the treaty been regarded by the Canadian Parliament? I will read from an able report made to the last Congress from the Committee on Commerce, who seem to have collected many important facts in connection with the subject. They say:

"The Welland canal, connecting Lakes Erie and Ontario, is extensively used by American shipping. Under an enactment of 1860, if vessels and goods having paid toll on the Welland canal enter the St. Lawrence canals or any Canadian port, all except ten per cent. of the Welland charges is refunded; thus creating a discrimination of ninety per cent. against vessels going to American ports, besides a free passage through the canals of the Galopé, Point Iroquois, Rapid Flat, Favian's Point, Cornwall, Beauharnois, and Laclune—a discrimination against the forwarders and millers of Rochester, Oswego, and Ogdensburg, the carrying systems of New York, and the shippers and merchants of that port. In the same way, vessels from Canadian ports on Lake Ontario or the St. Lawrence are charged only one tenth of the Welland tolls exacted if they pass from American ports."

Now, sir, most of the American vessels that pass through the Welland canal are destined for the port of Oswego, or Ogdensburg, in the State of New York. They go with rich cargoes of grain from Chicago, which thence find their way through the New York canal and over the railroads to New York city and Boston. A discrimination is made in favor of a vessel going with her cargo to a Canadian port. An American vessel bound to an American port is charged the whole amount of tolls for passing through the canal; but the vessel, American or English, passing to an English port has returned to her nine tenths of those duties. Now, sir, I appeal to every member of this House to say whether this is keeping the treaty in good faith as between the Canadian Parliament and our Government? Is it treating our citizens who are engaged extensively in the commerce of the lakes with ordinary fairness, and is it to be wondered at that we are disposed to put an end to the treaty by giving the notice that is required to effect that object?

Sir, I feel very much humbled in view of the necessity which prompts this great American Republic to throw itself into the lap of this English Delilah to be shorn of its strength. I do not know what the national necessities at other times may have required at our hands, but the news we have received this morning from our gallant armies in the field does not warrant us, in my judgment, in stooping so very low as to feel ourselves abused. I do not like exactly the tone of the communications which were read to-day as those made by our minister to the court of France. I think that the times have come to a singular pass when a unanimous vote of the American House of Representatives, protesting against foreign interposition, is to be treated lightly here or elsewhere, and I have yet to learn that it can be thus treated with impunity.

I say, sir, that we have been too much accustomed to throw ourselves into the power of Great Britain by the treaties we have hitherto made with that nation, and it may be germane to the present argument to allude briefly to the arrangement made in 1817 between the two Governments, whereby the northwestern lakes, with a population of ten million people upon their American borders, and upon whose bosoms floats one third part of the whole commercial wealth of our country, were placed at the tender mercies of Great Britain. That arrangement provides that neither Power shall keep more than one vessel on either of the great lakes, and that each vessel shall be limited to the use of one eighteen-pound gun. Now, Mr. Speaker, the authorities of our country are at this moment so much afraid of giving offense to the British Lion that they dare not place a naval depot or a navy-yard on the American coast of any one of those lakes, lest, forsooth, it may seem to infringe upon the spirit if not the letter of the treaty.

We have permitted Great Britain to go on since that compact was entered into and provide ship canals, by means of which she could determine, as she did determine when the "Trent affair" agitated the public mind, that the principal theater of war, in case a war should occur between the two Governments, should not be upon our seaboard, but upon the northern lakes, where they already have facilities for transporting their gunboats from Quebec, on the St. Lawrence, to Chicago upon Lake Michigan, and where they could devastate our fairest cities and destroy our richest commerce before we could prepare the simplest means of defense.

This is the situation in which we have placed ourselves in relation to the gigantic power of England. While we have folded our arms and been content to abide by the terms of the treaty, they have been preparing the way to throw a complete naval force upon the lakes at any moment that may suit their convenience without contravening the terms of the compact, but in reality overreaching us, and defeating the only object that led us into the arrangement.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I want to say to the gentleman that the last House of Representatives refused to enlarge the Illinois and Michigan canals so that we could bring gunboats from the Mississippi river into the lakes in order to meet British gunboats.

Mr. GANSON. For what good?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. To defend your own city of Buffalo, for one thing, from the attack of the Canadas.

Mr. PRUYN. This discussion turns upon the supplemental treaty of Ghent, and I will ask the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Illinois whether they understand the terms of the supplemental treaty of Ghent to relate to Lake Michigan, and whether that is one of its lakes intended to be included within the terms of that treaty? That is exclusively an American lake, and entirely within the American lines; and there we can build as many gunboats as we like.

Mr. SPALDING. I will reply to the gentleman by saying that I have corresponded with the head of the Navy Department on this subject, and I put the question directly to him whether Lake Michigan was intended to be included, and the reply was in the affirmative.

Mr. ARNOLD. The waters of Lake Michigan are entirely within American jurisdiction, and that treaty was made in reference to the boundary line between Great Britain and the United States.

And I will say further, in reference to the remarks about the enlargement of our canals, that there are a hundred vessels-of-war upon the Mississippi and its branches which, had the last Congress or this Congress had the wisdom to adopt the measure advocated by gentlemen from Illinois and other northwestern States, would have been available for the defense of the lakes from Chicago to Buffalo.

Mr. SPALDING. And I have a constituent who controls fourteen steam propellers, running from Chicago through the Welland canal to Ogdensburg, every one of which would make an efficient gunboat in one week, if we had a navy-yard in which we could prepare them for purposes of war.

I wish now to read for the information of the House a few sentences from this treaty of 1817, for I think we have some lawyers in the House as well qualified to judge of the true construction of that treaty as the officers of the Navy Department:

"The naval force to be maintained upon the American lakes, by his Majesty and the Government of the United States, shall henceforth be confined to the following vessels on each side; that is—

"On Lake Ontario, to one vessel not exceeding one hundred tons burden, and armed with one eighteen-pound cannon.

"On the upper lakes, to two vessels not exceeding like burden each, and armed with like force.

"On the waters of Lake Champlain, to one vessel not exceeding like burden, and armed with like force.

"All other armed vessels on these lakes shall be forthwith dismantled, and no other vessels-of-war shall be there built or armed. If either party shall hereafter be desirous of annulling this stipulation, and shall give notice of that fact to the other party, it shall cease to be binding after the expiration of six months from the date of such notice. The naval force so to be limited shall be restricted to such service as will, in no respect interfere with the proper duties of the armed vessels of the other party."

Mr. Speaker, I hope when we get our hands once in we will make clean work, and give this other notice spoken of in the treaty from which I have now read.

It will be conceded, I suppose, that Great Britain is prepared by means of her canals to guard against any unfriendly results growing out of the abrogation of either of these treaties.

Mr. WILSON. As the gentleman has again referred to the subject of canals, I would ask him whether the canal to which he refers is the one which the Illinois Legislature proposed to influence Canada to construct through the British provinces for the purpose of transporting the produce of the West to a market?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will answer the gentleman for my colleague: the canal we propose to construct will enable the gentleman's constituents to get their produce to New York at a great deal less price than they do now.

Mr. ARNOLD. In response to the gentleman from Iowa I would say that the people of the Northwest have suffered so much from the exorbitant prices levied upon their produce by the New York canals and railroads that they are willing and anxious, inasmuch as they could not secure an enlargement of the New York canals, to find a way for their produce through Canadian canals. Necessity compels them to do it, and it is because of that necessity that I am so much opposed to the termination of this treaty which affords us facilities for getting out our produce.

Mr. SPALDING. It is on account of that necessity that I am so strenuous for making a canal around the falls of Niagara.

Mr. WILSON. We are to understand, then, that it is necessary for us to prepare for the defense of the northern border of the United States by constructing a canal in conjunction with the Canadian authorities so as to admit more readily the passage of British gunboats into the lakes of the Northwest! We must do it in order to ship corn from the West to the East—the corn which the gentleman from Illinois told us in his speech last session is absolutely necessary for the sustenance of Europe and without which Europe would starve. We must, therefore, construct a ship canal within the British provinces, admitting the passage of British gunboats into the lakes, in order that we may ship the corn without which British subjects must starve!

Mr. ARNOLD. A single word in reply to my friend from Iowa. He complains that while we are seeking to defend the northern frontier by means of a canal through our own territory, which will enable our gunboats to go upon the lakes, it is inconsistent that we should desire additional canals through Canada. If the gentleman will examine with care the whole subject, he will find that there is not any inconsistency. Great Britain has already, as is well known, complete facilities for introducing her gunboats from the Atlantic, through the St. Lawrence and the canals, into the lakes. The construction of the proposed additional canal would not increase those facilities, but would very largely increase the facilities of the Northwest for carrying off its surplus produce. We would prefer to carry that produce through the New York canals. We would prefer to have a canal constructed around the falls of Niagara. We would desire the enlargement of the Erie and Champlain canals. As I said the other day, enlarge them all, construct them all, and we will tax them to their utmost capacity; but if New York will not do that, if Congress will not do it and these extortions are to continue, then we must go to the Canadians.

Mr. PRUYN. The gentleman talks about the high prices of transportation in New York. I would like to ask him whether the prices in Illinois are not very much higher than those in New York.

Mr. ARNOLD. There are some gentlemen in New York who have constructed railroads in the State of Illinois on which high rates are charged.

Mr. SPALDING. I must now resume the floor, and I hope I shall be permitted to proceed without further interruption. I wish to read a passage from the London Times, to which I have already adverted. It is headed, "Arming the northern frontier and the lakes," and is as follows:

"The worst part of the struggle, however, will not be on the Atlantic seaboard, but on the great lakes of Upper Canada and North America. We are glad, therefore, to be able to tell our readers that this danger has been foreseen, and amply provided against, and that within a week after the breaking of the ice a whole fleet of gunboats, with the most powerful of screw corvettes, sent out to Admiral Milne, will carry the protection of the British flag from Montreal to Detroit."

Mr. PRUYN. Were these gunboats ever sent?

Mr. SPALDING. No, they were never sent; but that is the threat given out in a British newspaper in regard to our helpless condition. And now I appeal to the pride of every American in this House whether this condition of things should be permitted to last much longer? In saying this, perhaps I am advocating the cause of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD.] If I am, so be it. I speak as an American citizen when I say that we are not to rest under this disadvantageous treaty which has been in existence for the last ten years between this Government and Great Britain because we are afraid of disturbing the amicable relations that now exist between the two countries. The way to preserve amicable relations is for the Government to show itself always ready and always able to resent insult and injury. In no other way can we maintain our own self-respect and the peace of the nation.

Mr. WARD took the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest that the vote on this question be taken at a given hour to-morrow, when there can be a full attendance of members.

Mr. WARD. I desire to move the previous question, and then I will yield the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. After the previous question is moved, the gentleman from New York will have an hour's time. I desire to occupy five or ten minutes on the subject; and the gentleman from New York offers to let me have that much time in his hour.

There was no objection.

Mr. PRUYN. I desire to say to my colleague that either now or to-morrow I should like to have ten minutes.

Mr. WARD. I prefer that my colleague should take his ten minutes now; for there are two other gentlemen who desire to speak for ten minutes each.

Mr. ARNOLD. My colleague, [Mr. J. C. ALLEN,] desires to occupy ten minutes.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 272) for the relief of Julia A. Ames; and an act (H. R. No. 377) making appropriations for the payment of the awards made by the commissioners appointed under and by virtue of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of persons for damages sustained by reason of the depredations and injuries by certain bands of Sioux Indians," approved February 16, 1863; when the Speaker signed the same.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTORS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to take from the Speaker's table the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 426) to create an additional supervising inspector of steamboats and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, and two local inspectors for the collection district of Oregon, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the Senate amendments be non-concurred in, and that the House request a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN H. SHULER.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of John H. Shuler, M. D.; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

An act (S. No. 265) to expedite and regulate the printing of public documents, and for other purposes, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

RECIPROCITY TREATY—AGAIN.

Mr. PRUYN. I did not expect at this time to address the House on this question, nor did I expect at any time to go into its details. I thought it quite likely that my friend from the Buffalo district would be prepared to speak on the subject to a much larger extent than I would venture to do. I wish to say briefly, in reference to the proposition submitted by the Committee on Commerce, and to the substitute offered for it, that the body of the delegation from the State of New York are, as I understand, in favor of the proposition reported by the Committee on Commerce. The difference between the two I understand to be this: that the substitute contemplates the giving of notice for an entire and final abrogation of the treaty, leaving it to future negotiation to determine whether any steps shall be taken for the formation of a new treaty; while the resolution reported by the committee provides also for a notice of the intention of the Government to abrogate the treaty, with the additional notification that this Government stands ready to enter into negotiations with Great Britain for the purpose of making a new treaty, if that be found desirable. It also authorizes the appointment of commissioners by the President for that purpose.

Now it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in every point of view the resolution of the committee is more desirable and more expedient than the substitute proposed. In the first place, no exception whatever can be taken by Great Britain to such a notice. In the second place, I look upon it as desirable, because it will permit arrangements to be made between the two countries in reference to the northwestern territory.

With our long frontier if we have no arrangement whatever we may rest assured that a contraband intercourse, an intercourse in violation of our revenue laws, will be constantly taking place to a very large extent. The gentleman from Illinois, from the Chicago district, thinks that we, in New York, are very selfish in regard to this matter, that we have imposed upon the West burdens too intolerable for them to bear. Now, what are the facts? Our State has raised on credit at a rate of forty-five or forty-six per cent. interest the money required for constructing the Erie and Champlain canal which we have given to the world almost free of charge. There is no channel of internal communication that I know where transportation is afforded with as much speed, certainty, and economy as the canals of New York furnish.

Now, in regard to our railroads it is well known that between the different parallel lines running east and west the competition is such that it is impossible for any railroad line through New York, Pennsylvania, or for the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, to obtain transportation at unreasonable or exorbitant rates. I will venture to say that so far as the New York railroads and canals are concerned, running back for a period of fifteen or twenty years, there is not one of them which has returned to its owners more than a fair or reasonable percentage of profit for the capital and labor expended.

While, therefore, I reach the same conclusion upon this point with the gentleman from the Chicago district, that which is contemplated by the committee in their resolution, I arrive at it by an entirely different mode of reasoning. I do not fear competition from the Canadian canals—we never feared it in New York—I simply wish to take advantage of our own facilities, and to do what we ought to do in our own State for the purpose of facilitating our own commerce, and I have no fear that we shall not retain the commerce of the great West.

Mr. ARNOLD. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York whether, during the last three years, the New York canals and railroads have been able to transport all the produce of the West to market. I ask him whether there has not accumulated in the warehouses at Chicago and at other points in the West millions of bushels of grain, for which it was impossible to obtain means of transportation.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. ARNOLD. I hope the gentleman will first permit the gentleman from New York to answer my question.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the gentleman from the Chicago district, or any other gentleman who brings up this question of canals and railroads upon this bill, what it has to do with the reciprocity treaty? I do not understand that the reciprocity treaty touches the canals and railroads in any respect, or that its abrogation will interfere at all with the competition that now exists. It will not interfere with any single question touching the matter of canals and railroads at all.

Mr. ARNOLD. If the gentleman from New York will allow me I will answer the gentleman's question; but I desire first to obtain an answer from the gentleman from New York to my question in regard to the capacity of the canals and railroads in New York to carry the products of the West as shown by the experience of the last three years. I desire also to know what dividends the New York Central Company has paid during the last year? I ask the gentleman whether it is not true, as stated in the public press, that they have divided ten per cent., and have a large surplus on hand.

Mr. PRUYN. I had not expected to go into the details of this question. I will answer the gentleman from Vermont in a general way, by saying that I had supposed that the arguments of all the gentlemen who have addressed the House on this subject in regard to the supposed effects of the reciprocity treaty bore directly upon the avenues of trade and commerce leading from our seaboard to the West. Why, sir, it is a question whether a vast amount of property is to pass over the railroads of Pennsylvania and New York and to some extent of New England. It is a question whether a vast amount of property is to pass over these lines to Canada, and whether in return a large amount of property is to come from Canada to pass toward the seaboard. It is an important question with reference to any line of communication as to what may be the character of this treaty if we are to draw a line between Canada and ourselves which cannot be passed except under restrictions that amount to prohibition.

Now, in regard to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] as to the accommodation afforded by the American lines of traffic for the purpose of carrying freight from the West to the seaboard; there is no question, and never any made, as to the entire capacity of these lines of communication to carry from the seaboard to the interior. It is only with reference to the vast accumulations of property which take place occasionally in the West that the question is asked. In all carrying trade you have to look at two considerations, not only traffic one way, but traffic both ways. If there is no traffic one way, or very much less one way than another, the way in which on that line of traffic the most is carried must be expected to be charged the most. When there has been a great crop in the West the lines of railroad and canal in New York and Pennsylvania which connect the West with the seaboard have hardly been sufficient for the purpose.

In regard to the canals in New York, what that State has made out of them has been four and a half, five, and six per cent. The whole railroad and canal system together has not paid legal interest on the investment.

And I venture to say in addition that the charge from Lake Erie to New York is much less than on the same kind of property in Illinois. As I understand this matter, it does not become the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] to complain of the high price in New York, for I believe the prices out there are much higher in proportion. They are certainly for passengers, and I think they are for goods traffic. I understood the gentleman to say that that was doubtless owing to the fact that the stock of Illinois railroads was owned in the East, and in New York. All I mean to say about that is, that we have men in New York, fortunate or unfortunate, as the case may be, to own stock West. As to the rates of dividends on railroad stock West I am not informed. I do not own a dollar in any of them. I must refer the gentleman, for detailed information on that point, if he has it not, to gentlemen in New England, as they own the greater portion of railroad stock in his State.

I come now to New York. The New York and Erie has never paid a dollar of dividend until a year past; and the New York Central has only paid seven per cent., the last being five per cent. for six months.

Mr. ARNOLD. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York what the effect will be if $18,000,000 additional products, instead of going to Canada, are thrown upon the New York railroads and canals? Will it not be necessarily to enhance the cost of transportation?

Mr. PRUYN. So far as the railroads are concerned, I will say that they will meet that traffic and take care of it. The roads would lay down a third line if necessary.

I do not occupy the narrow ground which the gentleman from Illinois seems to think I do, neither do my friends upon this floor. I take the ground that we are willing to see reciprocally broad relations existing between Canada and this country. We have no desire to check the growth of Canada, but on the contrary we wish to see her developed, for in time she is to be annexed to us and form a part of this country, and I look upon her growth and prosperity with the highest satisfaction. It may not be in five or ten years that this will be brought about, but the logic of events will bring these provinces to us in time. I want the gentleman from Illinois to occupy ground as broad as we do in New York.

One word more in relation to gunboats. I will not speak of building canals and railroads for commercial and business purposes, but the idea of enlarging canals for the purpose of transporting gunboats from the Atlantic to the lakes, or from the Mississippi to the lakes, is fallacious and absurd. Should war take place with a foreign Power we shall need all our naval force we have upon the Atlantic to protect our sea-coast, and all we have upon the Mississippi river to take care of the southern coast and the Gulf of Mexico. We can build all the gunboats we need in ninety days upon the streams leading into the lakes. We can build them upon the Chicago river, upon Buffalo creek, and upon some of the streams of Ohio leading into the lakes. We can do that even while the six months' notice is running, which, if we wish to abrogate the treaty of Ghent, we are obliged to give.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] read a few moments ago the supplemental clause which provides for the force to be maintained by the two parties upon the great lakes. This question came up two years ago in the New York Senate, when I had the honor of a seat in that body, and a discussion arose much like that which has taken place here to-day, and particularly the question of enlarging or building canals for the purpose of transporting gunboats from one point to another; that is, the question of undertaking a work which will require from six to ten years to complete, and which will cost vastly more than all the gunboats we shall ever build, and all for the purpose of enabling us, at some future and distant period, to carry gunboats from one point to another.

The question I then raised was whether Lake Michigan, being entirely within American jurisdiction, and not being one of the lakes which could be the subject of negotiation, unless expressly named between Great Britain and this country, could fairly be considered as being included within the supplemental treaty of Ghent; and whether that treaty did not relate exclusively to the great lakes which were owned by the parties in common. And the suggestion derives force from the fact that Lake Champlain, which for certain purposes is also called one of the great lakes, is expressly named, whereas Lake Michigan is not named. I do not, however, undertake here to solve that question, but it appears that the proper Department of our Government is of opinion that Lake Michigan is fairly included within that treaty of Ghent.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I have seen the communication of the Secretary of the Navy to which reference has been made, and I do not think it will fairly bear the interpretation attempted to be given to it. It was merely a recommendation and not a legal opinion upon the subject. The Attorney General of the United States has not given an opinion at all.

Mr. PRUYN. Now, sir, it so happened when I made this suggestion in the Senate of New York that a distinguished member upon the other side of the House, the Republican side, who had been earnestly advocating the measure then pending before that body, a man of great learning and a lawyer of high standing and ability, said that if that was the true construction of the supplemental treaty of Ghent, there was no use of discussing the question longer about enlarging our canals for that purpose.

But independent of that, I say that if we wish to build gunboats—and I trust we never shall need to build another—but if we are compelled to encounter war with a foreign Power and find it necessary to build gunboats for the protection of our northern frontier, we can do it better and more economically in the streams entering into the great lakes and on Lake Michigan, if we have the right to do so, than we can possibly do it at New York, Boston, or elsewhere, and transport them through to the lakes. The matter of building a fleet of gunboats would be very easily accomplished within the six months given us for the purpose; and it strikes me that it would be very unwise—speaking of the subject in this view only and not in a commercial point of view—for this country or for any one State to undertake an enormous expenditure of money, running through a long series of years, in order to accomplish such a result as is now spoken of.

Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, I trust that the resolution reported by the Committee on Commerce will pass the House, and that we will not summarily and arbitrarily cut off even any attempt at negotiation upon this subject. It is of vast importance to us of New York. We think that the very best commercial relations and the best feeling should be cultivated between this country and Canada. It will be mutually beneficial.

Mr. WARD. I now move the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. There are several gentlemen who desire to occupy ten or fifteen minutes upon this question. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] has kindly offered me ten minutes of his time, but I hope that by unanimous consent his time will be extended, so that he will be enabled to yield to others.

Mr. ARNOLD. My colleague, [Mr. J. C. ALLEN,] I know, desires to speak some ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. SWEAT. I think an additional hour will afford an opportunity to all the gentlemen who desire to make short speeches on this question to be heard.

Mr. MORRILL. Say half an hour.

Mr. PRICE. I move that we take a recess until seven o'clock, and have these speeches tonight.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That motion is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. It is in order; but the Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that he requires a quorum to take a recess, and there is evidently not a quorum in the Hall.

Mr. PRICE. Well, we can send for members. Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Iowa insists on his motion, I shall move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion will take precedence.

Mr. PRICE. I do not insist on it.

Mr. WARD. I understand that there are four gentlemen who desire to speak ten minutes each.

I do not propose to occupy the whole of my hour, and will yield a portion of it to others, but I ask that the time for debate may be extended half an hour so that these gentlemen may be accommodated.

The SPEAKER. Then, if there be no objection, the understanding will be that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] is to have an hour and a half, and he can divide the time among other gentlemen as he sees fit, the vote to be taken at the end of that time.

No objection was made.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

And then, on motion of Mr. COFFROTH, (at five minutes to five o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 26, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented a petition of officers in the civil service of the Government resident in Washington, District of Columbia, praying for an increase of compensation; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. COWAN presented a memorial of persons engaged in the express business in the State of Pennsylvania, and two memorials of persons engaged in that business in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against any change in regulating the manner of taxing express companies; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON. I present the petition of the Hamilton Bank and other banks of the city of Boston, and also bank officers and directors and business men of that city, respectfully petitioning Congress to have the act for the establishment of banking institutions in the United States, now under consideration, so amended as to require the associations under it to hold at any and all times a proportion of the reserve in the lawful money of the United States, provided for by the thirty-first section of the act now referred to, in specie, gold and silver coin, either or both, and that this reserve in specie shall be continued until the resumption of specie payments by the Government and banks of the United States. I suppose it is too late to act on the subject now, and I therefore move that the petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom the subject was referred, reported a joint resolution (S. No. 59) to provide for the revision of the laws of the District of Columbia; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 292) to provide for the efficiency of the Navy, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the following subjects; which was agreed to:

A petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying that seamen transferred from the Army to the Navy may be entitled to the benefit of the State family aid funds of the States furnishing such aid, and that the Government furnish such seamen their uniforms, to be refunded from any prize money to which they are entitled; and

A resolution of the Senate of March 16, instructing the committee to inquire if some mode of promotion in the volunteer Navy, analogous to that of the regular Navy, may not be established.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was recommended a bill (H. R. No. 383) to incorporate the Home for Friendless Women and Children, reported it with amendments.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 192) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1865, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate to the said bill, reported a recommendation that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House and disagree to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate to the said bill.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and amended as aforesaid; and

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 192) disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagree to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate thereto, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

THE "ARQUELLES" CASE.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following resolution, which lies over for consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate, if he shall not deem it incompatible with the public interest, whether he has, and when, authorized a person alleged to have committed a crime against Spain, or any of its dependencies, to be delivered up to officers of that Government, and whether such delivery was had, and, if so, under what authority of law or of treaty it was done.

SUPPRESSION OF NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. POWELL. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the conduct of the executive authority of the Government, in recently closing the offices and suppressing the publication of the World and Journal of Commerce, newspapers in the city of New York, under circumstances which have been placed before the public, was an act unwarranted in itself, dangerous to the cause of the Union, in violation of the Constitution, and subversive of the principles of civil liberty, and as such is hereby censured by the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Let that lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over.

Mr. POWELL. I ask that the resolution be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to print will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SUMNER. I presume there will be no objection to printing the resolution.

Mr. POWELL. It has not been the custom to refer a motion to print a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be treated as a bill, and the motion will be put to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 421) to pay, in part, for publishing the debates of Congress, and for other purposes, to report the same back to the Senate without amendment and recommend its passage. I am also instructed to make a statement of the two propositions that have been made to Congress by the publishers of the Globe; and although I do not propose to ask for a vote upon the bill at this time, if Senators wish to examine it, I should like to make a statement of the case now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a statement concerning the bill just reported by him. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. It must be obvious to every one that the publication of the Globe cannot be continued under the present contract, unless it was one that was enormously too high at the time it was made. All the expenses of publishing have been greatly increased; some of them have been doubled, some more than doubled, and the publication probably in the hands of almost any other man would have been discontinued; but the late Mr. Rives had made this work his idea, his object, and the pride of his life, and he kept it along in the expectation that there would be some increase in the compensation. We can hardly expect that his representatives will do the same thing. It is for Congress to decide whether they desire the continuation of the debates in the Congressional Globe; and, if they desire it, to decide upon which of the modes of increased compensation they will accept. I have prepared a memorandum on this subject which is very brief, and which I will submit to the Senate.

In one of the earliest sessions of Congress a proposal to supply the members with three copies each of a register of debates was voted down. The propriety of having the debates reported, however, was recognized, and in February, 1795, Hon. William Loughton Smith, a very able debater, afterward minister to Portugal, reported a resolution, which was passed, directing the Secretary of State to receive proposals from stenographers for furnishing accurate reports.

In January, 1796, Mr. Smith introduced a resolution by the passage of which David Robertson, of Petersburg, Virginia, was appointed official reporter to Congress. It was stipulated that his annual salary should be $4,000 in full for his services, clerk hire, stationery, and all incidental expenses. Moreover, it was stipulated that if he furnished his manuscript to Andrew Brown, printer of the Philadelphia Gazette, for publication, Mr. Brown was to pay therefor $1,100 of the salary, making the expense to be defrayed from the public Treasury $2,900.

On the removal of the seat of Government from Philadelphia to Washington, Mr. Harrison Smith followed with his printing office, and on the 31st of October, 1800, commenced the publication of the National Intelligencer, which gave an imperfect report of the proceedings of Congress. In 1807 Mr. Smith engaged the services of Mr. Joseph Gales, an excellent stenographer, who became a part owner of the National Intelligencer, and in 1810 purchased Mr. Smith's interest. Other papers had reporters at Washington, but the reports of the proceedings of Congress by the National Intelligencer were regarded as the most accurate, although they were often weeks in arrears.

In 1833 John C. Rives conceived the idea of publishing the debates in Congress, and soon afterwards employed W. E. Moore, a stenographer, to report them for him. The first number of the Congressional Globe was published—as a weekly sheet—on the 7th of December, 1833.

In 1845 the Senate Committee on the Library examined into the feasibility of having the debates published the morning after their delivery. They examined Mr. Gales, Mr. Rives, and others. In 1847 a bargain was concluded with Mr. Houston, a stenographic reporter, to furnish reports for the press. He was to print them on "slips," to be delivered to each Senator, and commenced to do so with the session of 1847-48. Before the session closed, he was several weeks behindhand with his reports, and the Senate finally paid him $5,000 to give up his contract.

On the 7th of August, 1846, the Senate Committee on the Library made a report, providing for a daily report of the proceedings of each day on the morning of the following day, and a revised and corrected publication of the same debates in book form, to constitute a parliamentary record. The editors of the National Intelligencer and of the Union agreed to publish the debates in their respective papers, in accordance with a resolution passed, at $7 50 a column. Subsequently, the editors of the National Intelligencer and of the Union relinquished their contracts, and Mr. Rives then reestablished the Daily Globe to publish the debates. It was understood by him that he was to receive the same price which had been paid the retiring contractors for reporting the debates and publishing them in the Daily Globe so that members could read their remarks in print and correct them before they were permanently placed "on the record" in the Congressional Globe. Mr. Rives also understood that he was to have the privilege of supplying every new member of Congress with a complete set of the Congressional Globe, and that he was also to receive "one cent for every five pages excess over three thousand for a long, and fifteen hundred for a short, session."

Congress evidently agreed with Mr. Rives in his construction of the verbal understanding between its committees and himself for several years. But in 1856, on the passage of the bill changing the compensation of members, the purchase of complete sets of the Congressional Globe for new Senators, Representatives, and Delegates was abrogated. In the opinion of Mr. Rives, (as expressed in a letter written under his direction just prior to his death,) the furnishing of these back volumes of the Congressional Globe was as much a part of his agreement with Congress as was the furnishing of the current report of debates. He had the back numbers reprinted and stereotyped, erecting a fire-proof building for the reception of the stereotype plates, and was always ready to furnish the back volumes, which he regarded it as his right to supply and to receive compensation for. His efforts during the Thirty-Fourth, Thirty-Fifth, Thirty-Sixth and Thirty-Seventh Congresses to be permitted to carry out in good faith what he regarded as his part of the agreement proved unavailing, but he continued the work—to use his own words, as dictated to his chief clerk—"in the belief that Congress would finally do him justice; would restore that which had been taken from him. But for this belief the reporting and printing of the debates by Mr. Rives would have ceased several years ago."

The increase in the rates of compensation to employes, the price of paper, &c., &c., at the commencement of the present session, rendered it imperatively necessary for Mr. Rives to enter into some new arrangement for reporting and publishing the debates, and after informal consultation with the two Committees on Printing, he submitted two propositions, either one of which would be acceptable to him, namely:

The second proposition was in accordance with the expressed wish of a majority of the Senate's Committee on Printing, that an increased rate of payment, equivalent to the increased cost of publication, might be agreed upon. It was that Congress should "pay an advance of fifty per cent. on the prices now paid to the proprietor of the Globe for the work done by him for the two Houses. This increase will make the price for reporting and printing the debates in the Daily Globe $11 25 a column; and $9 a copy for the Congressional Globe and Appendix for a long session, and $4 50 a copy for a short session. This increase to date from the beginning of the current (Thirty-Eighth) Congress." This, however, was regarded by Mr. Rives only as a temporary arrangement.

The first proposition is that which is embodied in the bill now before the Senate, which was passed in the House of Representatives by a very large majority. It proposes that Congress shall "restore that feature of its agreement with him which was observed for eight years from its date, and abrogated without notice to him at the close of the first session Thirty-Fourth Congress, on the passage of the bill changing the compensation of members, which agreement provided for the purchase from him of a complete set of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each new member who had not before received them." It also restores the additional compensation, paid by repeated acts of Congress in past years, of "one cent for every five pages exceeding three thousand pages for a long session, or fifteen hundred pages for a short session, including the indexes and the laws of the United States for this and each future Congress."

The difference in the cost of carrying these two propositions into effect is not very great.

The total amount paid for reporting and printing the Daily Globe, and for the Congressional Globe, during the Thirty-Seventh Congress was $166,570. Fifty per cent. additional on this sum makes $83,275.

This proposition requires an expenditure of $9,424 for the books for the Senate, and $47,120 for those for the House of Representatives. Add to this the increased pay of one cent for every five pages of the excess of the former contract, (and taking the Thirty-Seventh Congress as a fair average for the extent of the work,) it may be estimated that this will amount to an excess of fifteen hundred and four pages, which will produce the sum of $42,000. Add to this the amount required for the purchase of the Globes, the total cost will be $98,544, showing a difference of $15,000 between the two propositions. The difference will be less for the succeeding Congresses, inasmuch as the distribution will be made to fewer members.

It may not be improper to state that both these propositions were made to the House of Representatives, and the bill now before the Senate, which has been passed by the other House and which accepts the first proposition, was reported by the committee by order of that House. It is not the desire of the committee to press this bill to a vote now; but if the Senate is ready to vote upon it, as it is a matter that affects the business of the Senate, and that must be settled during the present session if it is the pleasure of the Senate to continue the publication of the Globe, it may perhaps be as well to act now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island if his attention has been directed to the propriety of an effort to reduce the volume of the Congressional Globe so as to save the increased expense in that way. I have always thought the full report in the Congressional Globe was a useless and cumbersome work, and that a reduction of it by some general system to about one half the present bulk would be fully as serviceable to the Government, and probably make the work more valuable as a book of reference. As is known to all of us, it is now very difficult to find anything in the Congressional Globe, because during the long session there are four or five volumes of it. It would be much more valuable if it were reduced. I, for one, and I think all members, would be perfectly willing to have what we say curtailed to an amount sufficient to reduce the cost of the Globe to at least the old price. I ask the Senator whether the attention of the committee has been directed to the practicability of reducing the volume.

Mr. ANTHONY. Somewhat; but it is an exceedingly difficult thing to do. It is impossible to cut down a Senator's speech without his own consent; and each Senator is apt to have quite as large an idea of the importance of what he says as his associates, I think. I do not see how we can publish the debates unless we publish them in full; although a careful and accurate abridgment of the debates, I have no doubt, would be more valuable.

I will take occasion now to state that in the early part of the session a resolution was adopted directing the Committee on Printing to inquire into the expediency of preparing a synoptical report of the debates, to be transmitted by telegraph, and to be made out accurately, giving the full business of the Senate and the points of the debates. That would undoubtedly be of more value, certainly of more transient value, and I think, upon the whole, perhaps of more permanent value than the publication of the Congressional Globe. But this difficulty is in the way at once: the committee were very favorably impressed with the idea, but upon consultation with those upon whom we must rely to transmit and to publish the report we found that they declined to enter into the arrangement; and I supposed the ruling reason was that they did not desire to place the expense of telegraphing in the control of Congress.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question.

Mr. WADE. I perceive that this matter is going to lead to considerable debate. I want to get up this morning a joint resolution of some importance. There is nothing before the Senate, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill reported by the Senator from Rhode Island is before the Senate by unanimous consent.

Mr. COLLAMER. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a single question. I observe in the published debates that we have sometimes fourteen columns of a speech delivered in the other House, where, according to the standing rule, a man is allowed but one hour—an amount of matter which could not be read in three hours. I consider that a very great abuse of this Government hiring a publication of the debates; and I want to know whether there is not some way in which that can be corrected. I wish the debates as they are delivered, not as they are written out after delivery; but I see very often in the publication of the debates of the other House speeches very much longer than those made here in the Senate. I wish to know whether that cannot be corrected.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is a matter, I suppose, for the consideration of the House of Representatives. The abuse has certainly been known to the committee for a long time; but we have not supposed it was our business to—

Mr. COLLAMER. My idea is that the bill should be so made and its provisions so arranged that the publication should not include speeches not delivered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that is the letter of the law now. I think the publication of those speeches that are written and not delivered is not within the law. I think it is a matter of courtesy—of abuse, rather.

I wish to say further in regard to a synoptical report, that I think the reports that have been made for the associated press, although at the beginning of the session they were justly subjected to a great deal of complaint, have improved a great deal during the progress of the session; but it is utterly impossible for a man to take a synoptical report of proceedings and transmit it as the debate is going on, and so that it will be published the next morning. Unless he waits until the Senate adjourns before he commences to make out his report, it is not possible for him to judge what space should be given to one part of the speech and what reserved for another. A Senator rises, and the reporter does not know whether he is going to speak five minutes or two hours. He gives no analysis of his speech to begin with; it is impossible to make a tolerable report of it and send it off while the proceedings are going on. The only way to have an accurate and thorough synoptical report is to have it prepared and revised after the adjournment, and then it would have to be transmitted at the expense of Congress, for the newspapers would not do it.

Mr. WADE. I move to postpone—

Mr. ANTHONY. If it is the pleasure of the Senate to take a vote now on this bill, without debate, we may as well do it.

Mr. COLLAMER. We are not ready to do it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I will not press it now.

VOTING IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. WADE. I move to postpone all previous orders and take up Senate joint resolution No. 57. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 57) to amend the charter of the city of Washington.

Mr. SUMNER. On examining this joint resolution I find that it is entitled a "joint resolution to amend the charter of the city of Washington;" of course in that aspect it is very important. On looking into the resolution I find that it provides as follows:

That in case any person shall offer and claim the right to vote at any election held in the city of Washington, whose name is not registered, his name shall be registered by the commissioners of election upon the terms and conditions following.

It will be observed here that the language is very broad. It is applicable to any person who shall offer and claim the right to vote at any election, and his name shall be registered upon certain specified conditions. Proceeding with the resolution, it appears the first condition is that he shall take a certain oath which is set forth, and if he be unable to understand the English language it is further provided that the oath shall be interpreted to him, so that it will be observed that this clause actually contemplates that certain persons shall be registered who do not speak the English language. It then proceeds to say:

If in his answers on oath he shall state positively that he has resided in the city one year next preceding the day of said election, designating particularly the place of his residence, and that he possesses the other qualifications of an elector, and if, furthermore, some qualified elector of the city, not a candidate for any office at that election, shall take an oath before said commissioners, which any one of them may administer, that he is well acquainted with such applicant; that he is, in fact, a resident in the city, and has been one year next previous to such election, and that he (the qualified elector) has good reason to believe and does believe that all the statements of such applicant are true, the commissioners shall cause his name to be registered by their clerk, and shall then receive the vote of said applicant.

Now, it will be perceived from these words which I have read, first and last, that it is directly applicable, in the first place, to any person who shall offer and claim the right to vote at an election, but after taking the oath he is to show residence for a certain term in the city, and then it is added, he is also to show that "he possesses the other qualifications of an elector." What are the other "qualifications of an elector?" I presume if we go back to the original charter we shall find it is that qualification which, as I said the other day, is the tail of slavery, that discrimination of color left to us unhappily by the former presence of slavery in the national capital. I know not if the committee that reported this bill propose to keep alive that ancient and odious discrimination; but it seems to me that if the language of this joint resolution be interpreted according to its natural signification, and certainly as such language is apt to be interpreted here in Washington, it will operate to the exclusion of persons except of the favored color. I know my friend from Ohio does not contemplate any such exclusion; but this joint resolution which seeks to amend the charter of the city of Washington ought to be made clear and also in that respect unobjectionable; it ought not to be made the means of continuing and of extending that odious discrimination. I therefore propose to amend the joint resolution by adding to it these words:

Provided, That there shall be no exclusion of any person from the register on account of color.

Mr. WADE. I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts knows what my views are as to the question of the exclusion of colored persons from the right of voting. I have stated my views on that question often enough, and I have expressed them by my votes occasionally. It was not my purpose in reporting this joint resolution to alter the present law on that subject, and it does not contemplate any such thing now. There is another measure pending upon which that question as to the qualification of voters in this District will come before us and will be debated and passed upon by the Senate. The object of this joint resolution is barely to regulate the right of voting among the qualified voters of the District, without adding to or diminishing anything from the qualifications now fixed. It is a temporary measure, necessary for the justice of the approaching election, without which a fair vote of the whole qualified electors cannot be had. By an old law, persons must be registered six months before the election in order to be entitled to vote. The election for mayor of the city will soon come on; and as the law does not provide for registering any one whose name was not registered six months ago, it causes great difficulty. The judges of election, as I understand, have sometimes construed that law in different ways, biased probably very much by their party predilections as the elections have come on from time to time. The object of this joint resolution is barely to fix the law on that point and to give effect to a custom that I understand has sometimes prevailed in the District, which is a fair one so far as the voting of the qualified electors is concerned. Many of them have not been registered, not availing themselves of the old law, perhaps because they were absent from the city, perhaps from carelessness, or from a thousand other reasons. The result is, as I am told, that some of the oldest and most respectable persons in this city are not eligible to vote at the coming election under the technicalities of the old law. The committee only wish, in accordance with the will of the people here, to rectify that so that there may be a fair election. It does not contemplate going into the question of the right of suffrage, or extending that right beyond those who are at present authorized to exercise it. It does not widen the suffrage; it does not narrow it. It does no more than to permit those who are qualified under the existing laws to come in fairly and vote, instead of being deprived of the right by the technicalities of the old law, which render it impossible for some of the best men in the city to vote at the coming election.

As I said before, there are different constructions put upon the law. Sometimes it has been construed in one way and sometimes in another, biased undoubtedly by the party predilections of the judges. At any rate it is uncertain, and it ought to be made certain. This joint resolution is brought up for that special purpose. Of course we all know that if we undertake now to fix the elective franchise permanently, if we undertake to alter the qualifications of electors here, we cannot pass this resolution in time for it to be of any avail. There is a bill back of this which fixes that matter, and I suppose I need not now define my position upon that bill, because it is well known that I am utterly opposed to any restriction upon the voting of any intelligent person in the community, whatever his color or condition may be. I do not think it is proper for us on this occasion to attach such an amendment as is now proposed, because it is not the object to raise that question on this resolution, and if it be brought up we cannot pass the resolution in time to make it available. We might as well say that we will pass no law on any subject until this grievance is corrected, if grievance it be. I know that I am as strenuous an advocate for the right of voting for colored people as the Senator from Massachusetts; and whenever a case can be made where that question can be tested, I shall endeavor to make myself known and understood upon it, if I have not already done so. I do not, however, think it is incumbent upon us to insist upon it all the time whenever the question may be raised in any possible shape. We know that it is impracticable to act upon it now. This is a temporary law. The permanent law is before us and can be acted upon hereafter. This is a temporary measure to do the deed of justice to the qualified electors now under existing law, that the exigency requires. If we cannot now do all the justice we want to do, let us do what we can, and when the other bill comes up let us fix it right according to our judgment. I do not suppose this is a question of the greatest importance; but it is a question of some importance to the people here who are interested in having their political rights fairly weighed and appreciated in the District. Without this joint resolution it cannot be done.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the argument of my friend from Ohio was that the measure now before the Senate was temporary in its character. That is inconsistent with the title of the joint resolution. As I read it, it is as follows—

Mr. WADE. Let me explain: I say temporary, because we all know that there is a bill fixing the right of voting that I suppose is intended as a permanent law. This is temporary in that view. That is all I meant.

Mr. SUMNER. That certainly will not justify my friend in his argument, for on the face of it this is permanent. It is as permanent as anything else in the existing charter. Its title is "to amend the charter of the city of Washington." When this is done, what assurance has my friend that anything else will be done? There is a bill on our tables. How many other bills are there on our tables relating to other matters which we may not reach during this session, or, if we reach, on which we cannot expect harmonious votes in the two Houses?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the Senator to call up the order of the day, being the tax bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Let us vote on this.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suggest that we finish this joint resolution. It has been up two or three days and the debate is nearly through. I observe that by taking up a bill one day and leaving it unfinished it takes up as much time the next day. I hope the Senator from Maine will allow us to dispose of this question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If there is to be no more debate I shall not object.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the debate is about ended. I suggest it for the purpose of getting on with the business of the Senate. I am anxious for an early adjournment. There is certainly no necessity for elaborating this question; we can all understand the condition of the negro in respect to public affairs now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the further consideration of the joint resolution before the Senate?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object if there is to be any further debate.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope there will be no further debate, but that we shall vote on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and then on the joint resolution. It is necessary that some action should be taken. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts—

Mr. SUMNER. I do not wish to throw any impediment in the way of business.

Mr. CONNESS. Then let us vote.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to make a remark in reply to my friend from Ohio. I had not finished what I have to say. It is very little I have to say.

Mr. DAVIS. If this subject is going to produce further debate, I object to its going on. If the Senator from Massachusetts makes a speech there will be speeches in reply to it, I do not care whether his speech is long or short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate, then, will resume the consideration of the special order.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire if the Senator from Maryland desires at this time a vote on the amendment which he submitted yesterday?

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that the chairman of the Committee on Finance proposed himself to offer an amendment to the particular clause in the seventy-seventh section on which I commented yesterday, and that may dispense with the necessity of the amendment I suggested.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have drawn a substitute for that section which I will submit now. I move to strike out all of section seventy-seven after the word "that," and to insert:

No license hereinafter provided for shall, if granted, be held or construed to exempt any person carrying on the trade, business, or profession specified in said license, from any penalty or punishment provided by the laws of any State for carrying on such trade, business, or profession within such State; or in any manner to authorize the commencement or continuance of such trade, business, or profession contrary to the laws of such State, or in any places prohibited by municipal law; nor shall any such license be held or construed to prevent or prohibit any State from placing a duty or tax for State or other purposes, on any trade, business, or profession for which a license is required by this act; nor shall any person carrying on any trade, business, or profession for which a license is required by this act, be exempted from procuring such license, or from any penalty or punishment herein provided, by or in consequence of any State law either authorizing or prohibiting such trade, business, or profession.

Mr. JOHNSON. The latter part of the amendment proposed by the chairman of the committee seems to me to be liable to the same objection to which I supposed the latter part of the section itself as it originally stood was liable. It all other respects it seems to me to be very much better than the section itself. But still I am at a loss to see with what propriety, I was about to say, we can authorize a license to be granted to carry on within a State a trade prohibited by the laws of that State. The argument of the honorable Senator from Maine is that unless that is done the business prohibited will be carried on and the State law will be violated just as much without such a clause as this as with it, and that the effect of such a clause on the contrary would be to assist in the execution of the State law. It may be so, but I do not exactly see it in that light. In order to carry out my own view and be consistent with myself, (though that is a matter of indifference on a question like this,) I propose to amend the amendment by striking out the latter part of the amendment suggested by the chairman. I move to strike out of it the following words:

Nor shall any person carrying on any trade, business, or profession, for which a license is required by this act, be exempt from procuring such license or from any penalty or punishment herein provided, by or in consequence of any State law either authorizing or prohibiting such trade, business, or profession.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The result of that would be that in States which prohibit a particular business, it may be carried on in defiance of the State law and we can exact no license. For instance, take the State of Maine. I exemplify that because I am more familiar with its laws, which prohibit the sale of spirituous liquors; a person may sell liquors if he chooses to do so in defiance of the State law prohibiting it and take his risk about it, and the existence of that law would be considered as an exemption to him from taking out a license under this law. The result is that we exact a license for selling liquor in all States where it is not prohibited, but cannot exact any license in any State where it is prohibited. The operation of the law in our State and in other States has been this: the State law prohibits the business; we prohibit it also without a license; but so far as we are concerned, if you choose to take a license, we have no claim on you for carrying on this business; you may go on at your own risk in regard to the State laws. The effect of that is, that if a license is taken out it really points the State officers to the man who designs to violate their law. It is no violation of his rights where he assents to it; and where two parties agree, one to take a license and the other to give it, it does not extend beyond the parties themselves; and there is no reason why it should not be taken if he chooses to take it.

We cannot very well make a distinction between different States. We are saying that no business shall be carried on any where within the Union of a particular kind without a license. We know that in some States of the Union they prohibit the business entirely. Very well; we put in a clause substantially saying, "you must take your risk about this; our license shall not justify you in breaking the State laws; we will give you one which will excuse you so far as we are concerned, but you must proceed at your own hazard in regard to the State laws." If we do anything else, if we take any other course, we make a distinction between the States, and say that in some States we will not require any license at all. The effect, in my judgment, will be very bad, and I believe that the working of the law as it existed two years ago, which was substantially the same as this section of the bill, has been very beneficial.

Mr. HARRIS. I always hesitate to disagree with my friend from Maryland; but it seems to me that this section is very skillfully framed to accomplish a very useful purpose. Let me suppose a case. By the law of the State of New York dealing in lottery tickets is prohibited, and it is an indictable offense; but I will suppose—I speak within bounds when I say—that there are one hundred persons engaged in the sale of lottery tickets in the city of New York. Suppose the State authorities prosecute one of these men for a violation of the laws of New York, and he answers that by the tax law passed by Congress he is authorized to take out a license to sell lottery tickets, the public authorities carrying on the prosecution reply to him, "By the seventy-seventh section of that law it is provided that your license shall be no defense." That is as it should be.

Now, I will suppose another case; suppose this same lottery dealer is prosecuted by the collector or assessor for selling lottery tickets without a license. He answers to that prosecution, "It is true I am selling lottery tickets without a license; but this is a thing that is illegal in the State of New York." The last clause which it is proposed to strike out here says that shall be no defense. It ought not to be a defense. If he will sell lottery tickets he ought to take out a license; and he ought to be amenable to the law of Congress, and he ought to be amenable to the law of the State, I can see no objection to it; and these provisions are framed so as to be an answer to a defense set up if he is prosecuted by the State authorities, or if he is prosecuted under this law.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am certainly very far from desiring to throw any impediment in the way of the beneficial operation of this law. The difficulty with me, however, in relation to the particular question before the Senate, is whether we have any authority to do what we are about to do if we adopt either the seventy-seventh section as it originally stood or as it is proposed to be modified by the honorable chairman. The Senator from New York supposes that he illustrates the necessity of such a provision as this by telling us that the sale of lottery tickets in New York is prohibited by a law of the State, and notwithstanding that they are sold from time to time. Over that we have no control in one sense unquestionably. Whether a man sells lottery tickets or not in the State of New York is a matter over which the Congress of the United States have no control. They can neither authorize the sale nor prohibit the sale.

Then he supposes that if such a man takes out his license under this act and he is prosecuted for violating the State law, he cannot rely upon the license as a defense against that prosecution, because the law under which the license is granted says in so many words that the license shall not be a defense, and that that is all right. Well, in one sense that is right. It is right because we have no authority by a license to authorize the sale of lottery tickets; but that is not the difficulty that stands in my way. I want to know upon what ground it is that we can first maintain the authority of Congress to demand a license to carry on a trade prohibited by a State law.

As far as that question is concerned, the amendment admits that we have no authority, because it says in so many words that the license shall not be a protection to him who shall violate, by carrying on the particular trade, the State laws. If we have no authority to authorize the violation of the State laws, upon what ground is it that we can say to him who is willing to violate the State laws, "Take a license from us; pay us for attempting to do what we admit is an illegal act; and if you do not take a license from us, and you undertake to sell without a license, we will prosecute you?" Now, where has Congress the authority—for it comes around at last to a question of power—where is to be found the authority in Congress to punish a man for not taking out a license to carry on a trade prohibited by a State, and which the State, as against Congress, has a right to prohibit? I am forced, therefore, to adhere to the opinion which led me to propose to amend the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose there can be no reasonable doubt that both Congress and the State Legislature have a right to tax the same subjects; and that a question of jurisdiction between the two authorities cannot come up unless the taxation proposed by one of them has exhausted the subject and leaves nothing upon which can be paid anything to the other authority. I suppose if Congress grants a license under this bill to do any business it does not prohibit the State authorities from requiring a State license for the same business. But I understand the proposition is to introduce an express provision in this bill that the license to be granted under it shall be no defense against a prosecution under a State law for a violation of that law. In my opinion, upon that point the bill should contain no provision whatever. It should leave the party obtaining the license to the full operation and effect of the license under this bill, and also to the full effect and operation of the law of the State that required a license for the same business.

I do not think that a person obtaining a license under this bill should be deprived of any ground or right of defense which he might have under and in virtue of the bill against a prosecution under the State law, by any express words or provision of the bill which we are about to pass. I think he ought to be left to take his fate under the jurisdiction of the two authorities; that is, the authority of Congress and the authority of the government of the State, without any expression on the part of the law which may be passed by Congress that he shall have no right of defense, perfect or imperfect, under that law against a prosecution under the State law and authority.

I think, therefore, that so far as the proposition under consideration proposes to insert words declaring that a license obtained under this act shall not be pleaded or considered as matter of defense in favor of the party who obtains the license, against a prosecution under a State law, it is wrong. If a license is directed by the law of that State to be granted, and the business is allowed to be carried on under a license, of course the State law is not violated; but if a particular business is not allowable by the State law, and there is a positive prohibition and a penalty in the case, and he carries on the business against the positive prohibition of the State law, your United States license should not shield him; but I do not think that the party to whom, by the authority of this act, a license may be granted should be deprived of any right whatever which he might claim under the proper effect of this act, if it becomes a law, in any defense that he might make against a prosecution under a State law.

Mr. CONNESS. The object of this bill is to get revenue. If we can obtain revenue from the sources referred to I suppose there will be gain in that. We do not interfere, nor undertake to determine what is a moral transaction or what is not. We leave that to the States; the State determines it. If the party carrying on, we will say, the sale of lottery tickets as a business, or, in the State of Maine, the sale of liquor as a business, shall not take out a license, then the State authorities who have denounced these trades as immoral and wrong, and in violation of the public policy, will have the additional vigilance of the Federal officials to discover them. If they do take out a license to avoid that, then the State authorities who have denounced those transactions and trades will have the absolute evidence, and will know where to get it, to prosecute those parties engaged in illegitimate transactions, and thus destroy them. On the one hand, therefore, we shall get revenue, or, on the other hand, it will tend to destroy transactions and trades that are illegitimate and destructive to the community. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Maine will be adopted for these as well as other reasons that I will not occupy time in stating. It will give us revenue, and it will materially tend to cripple the operations of a cunning set of men who are engaged in making large profits from that which there is scarcely any difference of opinion about are discreditable transactions and trades.

Mr. DAVIS. In our desire to obtain revenue we ought not to violate a principle of common honesty to obtain it. If a business is immoral and vicious in its nature or tendency, and is so treated by State legislation and prohibited, the United States Government ought not, in the face of such a law and policy as that on the part of the State, to grant a license for carrying on that business. If it does do so, it ought not to carry the double dealing with it of seeking by a provision of the law to deprive the party to whom it grants the license to carry on the business of any legal defense or advantage which that license would give him. If Congress is about to pass a law authorizing a license to be given to a citizen of the United States to sell lottery tickets, or to sell spirituous liquors, it ought not, in the same, provision authorizing the granting of these licenses, to deprive him of the benefit of any legal defense which the license would give him against all antagonistic State laws. Why, sir, what sort of legislation would it be for Congress to pass a law licensing a business which the honorable Senator from California intimates may be vicious, against public law and public policy, and at the same time saying to the party to whom the license was granted, "Although we charge you money for carrying on this business, and give you our consent that you shall carry it on, yet our consent that you shall carry it on shall not inhibit any State in which it may be carried on from passing a law making it penal on your part to carry on that identical business, and to prohibit it and to punish you as a malefactor if you carry it on?"

It seems to me that that sort of legislation would be highly improper; that it would be derogatory to the character of Congress. If Congress passes a law imposing a tax upon any particular business for the purpose of obtaining revenue, in my opinion it ought to be satisfied with that amount of legislation, and ought not in the same legislation to say, "If you do carry on this business that you have paid us money for liberty to carry on, the license which we give you authorizing you to carry it on shall not be pleaded or used as matter of defense against State legislation which inhibits you from carrying it on."

It seems to me it is only necessary to state the proposition that the obliquity of that sort of legislation may be apparent. I repeat it would be, in my opinion, derogatory to the character of Congress to pass such legislation. It ought not to offer an inducement to a citizen of the United States to violate morals and public policy and State legislation, and require money to be paid for that inducement, and then expressly to say to the party who was beguiled into this business by this license at the cost of the money which he paid for it that he shall have no benefit of legal defense growing out of the license. I admit my surprise that such legislation is proposed; and especially do I express my surprise that the fair-minded Senator from California should give any countenance whatever to that character of legislation.

Mr. CONNESS. I cannot see the double-dealing in this legislation that the honorable Senator from Kentucky does. We do not say to any party, "You may carry on this business in violation of State law, or in derogation of any law, if you take this license;" but on the contrary we do say to him, "You shall not carry on this business unless you take the license; we do not say that you shall carry it on in violation of the State law if you do take the license." We leave the subject of morals in these matters where it belongs, to the legislation of the States. I cannot see anything unfair in it. I confess that the moral perceptions of my honorable friend from Kentucky are too fine for me this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask for the reading of the proposition upon which the Senate is about to vote.

The Secretary read the amendment proposed by Mr. JOHNSON, to strike out the following clause in the amendment offered by Mr. FESSENDEN as a substitute for the seventy-seventh section of the bill:

Not shall any person carrying on any trade, business, or profession for which a license is required by this act be exempted from procuring such license, or from any penalty or punishment herein provided by or in consequence of any State law, either authorizing or prohibiting such trade, business, or profession.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think I was mistaken in moving to strike out the whole clause, and in lieu of that I propose to strike out the words "or prohibiting" only.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment to the amendment will be modified as suggested by the mover; and the question is on the amendment to the amendment, as modified.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section seventy-eight, line two, after the word "sum" to strike out the word "herewith" and to insert "herein;" in line six, after the word "business" to strike out the words "at any place;" in line seven, after the word "at" to strike out the word "such" and to insert the word "the," and after the word "place" to strike out the words "under such" and insert the words "specified in their;" so that it will read:

Sec. 78. And be it further enacted, That there shall be paid annually for each license granted the sum herein stated respectively. Any number of persons, except lawyers, conveyancers, claim agents, physicians, surgeons, dentists, cattle brokers, horse dealers, and peddlers, carrying on such business in copartnership may transact such business at the place specified in their license, and not otherwise, that is to say.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seventy-eight, line twenty-two, at the end of the clause imposing a license on bankers, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That each savings bank shall be liable to pay $100 for license as a banker.

Mr. COLLAMER. That amendment provides, as I understand, that every savings bank shall pay $100.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If it does business as a banker it is required to pay $100 "for license as a banker."

Mr. COLLAMER. No. It provides that every one of them shall take out a license as a banker and pay for it whether they do any business or not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is not the meaning of the clause.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is evidently the meaning of the words of the clause.

Mr. FESSENDEN. "That each savings bank shall be liable to pay $100 for license as a banker."

Mr. COLLAMER. It appears to me as plain as the English language can read. This proviso stands entirely independent by itself. It is a proposition by itself that every savings bank shall pay $100 as a banker.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The idea is, that if a savings bank does business as a banker it shall pay $100 for a license.

Mr. COLLAMER. Undoubtedly it should if it does that sort of business, but the savings banks in my State do nothing of the kind.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will move an amendment to make it more clear I shall be very glad to accept it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I propose to insert the words "doing business as a banker;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That each savings bank, doing business as a banker, shall be liable to pay $100 for license as a banker.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is "doing business as a banker?"

Mr. COLLAMER. It is defined in the first part of the clause to which this proviso is an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. All savings banks lend money out.

Mr. COLLAMER. "Every person, firm, or company, and every incorporated or other bank, having a place of business where credits are opened by the deposit or collection of money or currency, &c., shall be regarded as a banker under this act." These institutions have nothing of the kind.

Mr. JOHNSON. They have with us.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is the difference in the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then they should pay a license.

Mr. COLLAMER. The savings banks in the part of the country with which I am acquainted do no sort of business as bankers. They simply receive deposits of money and lend it upon notes, bonds, mortgages, &c., for the benefit of the depositors—nothing else in the world. They issue no bills or anything of that sort. I move to amend the amendment by inserting those words,

"doing business as a banker," after the words "savings banks."

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest that they all do business as bankers, but all of them do not do banking business, and the phraseology of the amendment should be "doing a banking business." They do not do a discount business, and so they are not doing business as bankers.

Mr. COLLAMER. I take it the meaning of the word "banker" is defined in this section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are two or three definitions; one is, employing a certain capital in the business of banking. Savings banks have no fixed capital. Then again opening accounts "by the deposit or collection of money or currency subject to be paid or remitted upon draft or check or order."

Mr. COLLAMER. "Or where money is advanced or loaned on stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange," &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The proviso is intended to meet those cases where savings banks are incorporated and where they unite with the business of a savings bank that of a banker and trade upon the capital. It provides that where they trade upon their capital and become bankers, in the ordinary sense of the word, or the sense of the word defined here, then they shall take out a license. That is all there is of it.

Mr. COLLAMER. Our country savings banks lend money on notes, and they may come in under that definition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They invest the money in a certain way; that is all.

Mr. JOHNSON. They will come in under that clause, and I do not see why they should not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They do not do business at a profit. They do not discount.

Mr. JOHNSON. Many of them do.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Those that do should pay for a license.

Mr. JOHNSON. The mass of the savings banks in Maryland, as far as I know, in the larger cities, are, in the sense of the definition in this section, bankers.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then they are mentioned in this proviso.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is an exception. All savings banks will come in under this clause, whether they loan money or not, unless you put in this exception: the tax will be on the whole of them.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know that. Now the honorable member refers to what he calls the exception of the proviso.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Where then?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The difficulty we wished to meet was this: savings banks generally have no fixed, established capital. That is a part of the definition here. The tax is imposed on all banks having a capital. Under that, savings banks having no fixed, established capital, might escape it entirely, and yet they might go on, as some of them do, to do all the business of banking. What we wanted to provide for was simply this: that where they attempt, whether they have a fixed capital or not, to do business as bankers in the ordinary sense of the word, they shall take out a license; where they do not do that business they shall not take out a license. That is it precisely.

Mr. JOHNSON. That I understand; but I was about to say that looking to the object my friend from Vermont has in view, he will not accomplish it, I think, by his amendment. I agree with the chairman.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont is good as far as it goes.

Mr. JOHNSON. But it will not accomplish his object.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it will.

Mr. JOHNSON. The savings banks in Vermont, I suppose—I know it is the case with those in Baltimore—loan their money upon bonds, upon promissory notes, upon stocks; and any who loan their funds in that way are considered as bankers under this section. It must be so.

Mr. COLLAMER. I find I must qualify my amendment. I wish in the first place to describe the kind of savings banks in the part of the country where I am and generally. They are mere depositories of small sums, but making considerable in the aggregate. They receive them without pay and give certificates. They then lend that money. Most of it they lend as far as they can upon mortgage. They get the best security they can. Sometimes they loan it upon bank stocks. They get their interest in that way from year to year, and make dividends among the depositors who have made deposits longer than three months. They are generally enabled by this means to get about six per cent., and out of that they are enabled to pay expenses and divide five per cent., as they do generally. They loan money upon notes. That would bring them within the description mentioned in this section, and therefore they would be bound to take a license as the section stands. I am not prepared at this moment to say to what extent the amendment would go. What I desire is—and I can hardly think the chairman wishes to defeat it—that these little savings banks, undoubtedly highly beneficial to our country, should not be compelled to take a license for a business they do not do—banking. They receive no deposits except from people who deposit the money that they lend out for them and pay them the interest they get on it. They have no profits. They make no charges. They merely pay the expenses of their room and of their treasurer. It is not a place in which there can be any profit made to anybody, and I can hardly think it was really intended to include them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have stated that it was not.

Mr. COLLAMER. How then shall we get along with the provision about loaning money on "promissory notes?"

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because they have no fixed capital.

Mr. COLLAMER. You do not require that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes; "bankers using or employing a capital not exceeding the sum of $50,000."

Mr. COLLAMER. But beginning with the fourteenth line:

Every person, firm, or company, and every incorporated or other bank, having a place of business where credits are opened by the deposit or collection of money or currency, subject to be paid or remitted upon draft, check, or order, or where money is advanced or loaned on stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes are received for discount or sale, shall be regarded a banker under this act.

They fall within this description. They are placed where money is loaned on promissory notes and bonds.

Mr. JOHNSON. They are covered by "deposits," too.

Mr. COLLAMER. They are not deposits in the common sense of the term. They receive deposits of money to lend. I shall have to let this pass for the present until I prepare with more care the amendment I desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER.) The Chair understands the proposed amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee to be withdrawn for the present.

Mr. COLLAMER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to have it passed over for the present if I can.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have received one or two letters from the officers of savings banks in some of the counties in my own State, where the deposits are $10,000 and sometimes $20,000 in a year, and where it is not expected that they will go beyond that, or $25,000 at farthest. They suggested—and it appeared to me with some force—that if savings banks were required to take out a license at all it should be limited to those whose deposits on hand exceed some twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars. I think the chairman, perhaps, will agree to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to propose a remedy for this difficulty, but there is no difference of opinion as to what ought to be done, and it seems to me it could be remedied by inserting after the words "savings bank," in the twenty-second line, these words, "having no fixed capital." But at the suggestion of Senators I will consent to let it pass over informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the action on this proposed amendment will be passed over for the present, and the reading of the bill will be proceeded with. The Chair hears no objection. The question on that amendment will not be considered, therefore, as having been taken.

The next amendment was in line twenty-five, of section seventy-eight, to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty," so as to read:

Wholesale dealers whose annual sales do not exceed $50,000 shall pay fifty dollars for each license.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-six of section seventy-eight to strike out "obviously" and insert "in the judgment of the assessor or assistant assessor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifty-nine of section seventy-eight, after the word "sales" to insert "including sales of other merchandise."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ninety-three of section seventy-eight, after "is" to strike out "to" and insert "as a broker to negotiate;" in line ninety-four to strike out "purchase or sell" and insert "purchases or sales;" and after "securities," in line ninety-six, to strike out "for themselves or others;" so as to make the clause read:

Brokers shall pay fifty dollars for each license. Every person, firm, or company, except such as hold a license as a banker, whose business it is as a broker to negotiate purchases or sales of stocks, exchange, bullion, coined money, bank notes, promissory notes, or other securities, shall be regarded as a broker under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines one hundred and twenty-six and one hundred and twenty-seven of section seventy-eight, to strike out the words "and if exceeding the sum of $10,000, one dollar for each additional $1,000;" in line one hundred and twenty-nine to strike out "or" before "whose;" and after "products," in line one hundred and thirty, to insert "and whose annual sales do not exceed $10,000;" so as to make the clause read:

Produce brokers, whose annual sales do not exceed the sum of $10,000, shall pay ten dollars for each license. Every person, other than one holding a license as a broker, wholesale or retail dealer, whose occupation it is to buy or sell agricultural or farm products, and whose annual sales do not exceed $10,000, shall be regarded as a produce broker under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seventy-eight, line one hundred and thirty-five, after "dealer" to insert "or produce brokers;" in line one hundred and thirty-six to strike out "the agent of others to purchase or sell" and insert "a broker to negotiate sales or purchase of;" in line one hundred and forty to strike out "manage" and insert "negotiate freights and other;" so as to make the clause read:

Commercial brokers shall pay twenty dollars for each license. Any person or firm, except one holding a license as wholesale dealer or produce brokers, whose business it is, as a broker, to negotiate sales or purchases of goods, wares, or merchandise, not otherwise provided for in this act, or seek orders therefor, in original or unbroken packages, or to negotiate freights and other business for the owners of vessels, or for the shippers or consignors or consignees of freight carried by vessels, shall be regarded a commercial broker under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after "chemical," in line one hundred and fifty-nine of section seventy-eight, to insert "or scientific;" so as to make the clause read:

And provided further, That no license shall be required for any still, stills, or other apparatus used by druggists and chemists for the recovery of alcohol for pharmaceutical and chemical or scientific purposes which has been used in those processes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after "apples," in line one hundred and sixty-one of section seventy-eight, to insert "or grapes;" so as to make the clause read:

And provided further, That stills of apples, grapes, and peaches, distilling or manufacturing less than one hundred and fifty barrels per year from the same, shall pay $12 50 for a license for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and sixty-eight of section seventy-eight, after the word "part" to insert "or from any substitute therefor;" so as to make the clause read:

Brewers shall pay fifty dollars for each license. Every person, firm, or corporation, who manufactures fermented liquors of any name or description, for sale, from malt, wholly or in part, or from any substitute therefor, shall be deemed a brewer under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seventy-eight, after the word "barrels," in line one hundred and seventy-five, to insert "packages;" after the word "barrel," in line one hundred and seventy-seven, to insert "package;" and after the word "barrels," in line one hundred and seventy-eight, to insert "packages or casks."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was before the word "rental," in line two hundred and ten of section seventy-eight, to strike out "rental or estimated" and insert "yearly."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "kind," in line two hundred and twenty-four of section seventy-eight, to insert "not including spirits, wines, ale, beer, or other malt liquors;" so as to make the clause read:

Eating-houses shall pay ten dollars for each license. Every place where food or refreshments of any kind; not including spirits, wines, ale, beer, or other malt liquors, are provided for casual visitors and sold for consumption there-in, shall be regarded as an eating-house under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "license," in line two hundred and seventy-four of section seventy-eight, to strike out "and one dollar additional for every $100 premiums received by such agent;" so as to make the clause read:

Foreign insurance agents shall pay fifty dollars for each license.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. The word "or" in the two hundred and eighty-sixth line of the section should be stricken out. I move to strike it out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "horses," in line two hundred and eighty-nine of section seventy-eight, to insert "or mules;" after "horses," in line two hundred and ninety-one, to insert "or mules;" after "horse," in line two hundred and ninety-three, to insert "or mule or;" to strike out in lines two hundred and ninety-three, two hundred and ninety-four, and two hundred and ninety-five the words "the third class, and shall pay twenty dollars for each license; when traveling;" and to strike out "fourth" in line two hundred and ninety-five and insert "third;" so as to make the clause read:

Peddlers shall be classified and rated as follows, to wit: when traveling with more than two horses or mules, the first class, and shall pay fifty dollars for each license; when traveling with two horses or mules, the second class, and shall pay twenty-five dollars for each license; when traveling with one horse or mule, or on foot, the third class, and shall pay ten dollars for each license.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the words "as aforesaid" after "persons" in line three hundred and three of section seventy-eight.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "butchers," in line three hundred and forty-eight of section seventy-eight, to insert "whose annual sales do not exceed $1,000, and butchers;" after the word "exclusively," in line three hundred and forty-nine, to strike out "from a cart or wagon;" and after the word "agents" to insert "and persons who sell shell or other fish, or both;" so as to make the clause read:

That butchers whose annual sales do not exceed $1,000, and butchers who retail butchers' meat exclusively by themselves or agents, and persons who sell shell or other fish, or both, travelling from place to place, and not from any street or stand, shall be required, &c.

Mr. SUMNER. There is an ambiguity in that clause it seems to me in the use of the word "street" in line three hundred and fifty-two. I would suggest the word "shop" instead of "street," so as to read "and not from any shop or stand." On page 99 the word "street" is used to indicate an out-door sale. I presume here from the context that it is not intended to mean a sale from a shop or stand. It seems to me that the ambiguity which is in the clause from the use of the word "street" would be removed by the substitution of "shop."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "street" and inserting "shop."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was to insert after "meat," in line three hundred and fifty-six, the words "or fish."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following clause in lines three hundred and fifty-seven, three hundred and fifty-eight, and three hundred and fifty-nine of section seventy-eight:

And provided further, That no license shall be required of a butcher whose annual sales do not exceed $1,000.

And to insert:

And no license shall be required of persons who sell shell or other fish from hand-carts or wheel-barrows exclusively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the word "and" after "museums," in line three hundred and sixty-two of section seventy-eight; and after the word "museums" to insert "concert halls and melodeons."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line three hundred and sixty-six of section seventy-eight, after the word "operatic" and before "representation" to insert "or other."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add after the word "act," in line three hundred and sixty-nine of section seventy-eight, the following proviso:

Provided, That when any such edifice is under lease at the passage of this act the fee for license shall be paid by the lessee, unless otherwise stipulated between the parties to said lease.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line three hundred and ninety-two of section seventy-eight, after the word "pay" to strike out "according to the number of alleys or tables belonging to or used" and insert "ten dollars for every alley or table;" so as to read:

Bowling-alleys and billiard-rooms shall pay ten dollars for every alley or table in the building or place to be licensed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "licensed" to strike out "when not exceeding one alley or table, ten dollars for each license; and when exceeding one alley or table, ten dollars for each additional alley or table."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "used," in line four hundred and twenty of section seventy-eight, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That all accounts, notes, or demands for the use of any such horse or jack without a license, as aforesaid, shall be invalid and of no force in any court of law or equity.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line four hundred and twenty-five of section seventy-eight, after "person" to strike out "whose business it is" and insert "who;" after "reward," in line four hundred and twenty-six, to strike out "to" and insert "shall;" in line four hundred and twenty-eight, before "advice" to insert "legal;" after "to" to strike out "causes" and insert "any cause;" and after "or" to strike out "matters pending therein" and insert "matter whatever;" so that the clause will read:

Lawyers shall pay ten dollars for each license. Every person who, for fee or reward, shall prosecute or defend causes in any court of record or other judicial tribunal of the United States or of any of the States, or give legal advice in relation to any cause or matter whatever, shall be deemed to be a lawyer within the meaning of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line four hundred and sixty-one of section seventy-eight, after the word "miners" to strike out "actually producing;" so as to make the clause read:

Miners shall pay for each and every license the sum of ten dollars. Every person, firm, or company who shall employ more than one person under him or them in the business of mining coal, gold, silver, quicksilver, copper, lead, iron, zinc, spelter, or other minerals, shall be regarded as a miner under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to strike out that paragraph beginning in the four hundred and sixty-first line and ending in the four hundred and sixty-sixth line with the word "act."

Mr. HOWE. With the consent of the Senator from California I propose to offer a substitute for that paragraph.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well; I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOWE. I move to strike out that paragraph beginning with the word "miners" and ending with the word "act," and in lieu of the words stricken out to insert:

Assayers assaying gold and silver, or either, of a value not exceeding in one year $250,000, shall pay $100 for each license, and $200 when the value exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $500,000, and $500 when the value exceeds $500,000. Any person or persons or corporation whose business it is to separate gold and silver from other metals or mineral substances with which such gold or silver or both are alloyed, combined, or united, or to ascertain or determine the quantity of gold or silver in any alloy or combination with other materials, shall be deemed an assayer for the purposes of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert at the end of section seventy-eight the following clause:

A license fee of ten dollars shall be required of every person, firm, or corporation engaged in any business, trade, or profession whatsoever, for which no other license is herein required, whose gross annual receipts therefrom exceed the sum of one thousand dollars per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seventy-nine, line three, after the word "dealers" to insert "except retail dealers in spirituous and malt liquors."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. The word "tobacconists" should be repeated after "eating-houses" in line six of this section. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section eighty, line six, after the word "produced" to strike out "or at any other principal place of business of such manufacturer or producer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know that I understand section eighty exactly. By a previous section manufacturers who sell any goods, wares, or merchandise are required to take out a license; but if I read this section aright, no license is required of any such manufacturer for anything he sells at the manufactory. Is that really the intention of it? A cotton manufacturer, according to this section, as I read it, no matter how much he sells, much or little, if he sells only at his own factory, does not require any license. I fancy that the committee intended to include in the sixth line the words "not exceeding $1,000." I think that has been neglected. I cannot conceive that the section is consistent with the rest of the bill unless the words "not exceeding $1,000" be inserted; and I presume those words have been omitted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let that section be passed over, and I will look at it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose it was thought that because a license was required of manufacturers we ought to permit them to sell their goods at the factory without another license.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Maryland is right. The manufacturer is required to take out a license for manufacturing; and this section is intended to provide that he shall not be required to have an additional license for selling at his own manufactory. The license here mentioned is for the sale of the goods.

Mr. COLLAMER. No man is required by this bill to take out a license for making anything unless he makes it for sale. A man is not to take out a license for making anything that he makes for his own use. The license is to make and sell.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let the section be passed over and I will look further into it. I think the design was simply to say that a person who manufactures articles, having taken out a license as a manufacturer, shall not be required to take out an additional license to sell, where he sells at the manufactory.

The next amendment was in section eighty-one, in line nine, to strike out after "any" the word "such;" after "manufactory" to strike out "for which he, she, or they may be;" and in line twelve, after "elsewhere," to strike out "he, she, or they," and insert "every person;" so as to read:

First. Before commencing, or, if already commenced, before continuing, any manufacture liable to be assessed under the provisions of this act, and which shall not be differently provided for elsewhere, every person shall furnish, without previous demand, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-three, after the word "return" to insert "under oath."

Mr. HOWE. Usually where we have employed those words we have included "or affirmation" with them. I move that modification.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was in section eighty-two, before the word "manufactures," in line nine, to insert "products or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten of section eighty-two, after the word "demand" to strike out "either personal or written" and insert "in writing delivered to him in person or;" after "his," in line twelve, to strike out "her, or their;" after "manufactory," in line thirteen, to insert "or sent by mail;" and after "such," in line fifteen, to insert "producer or;" so that the clause will read:

And for neglect to pay such duties within ten days after demand in writing delivered to him in person, or left at his house or place of business, or manufactory, or sent by mail, the amount of such duties, with the additions hereinbefore prescribed, may be levied upon the real and personal property of any such producer or manufacturer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-one of section eighty-two, to strike out after "in" the words "the general provisions of;" and after the word "act" to strike out "provided, that" and insert "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty of section eighty-two, before "manufactured goods" to insert "produced or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I do not wish to make a motion, but it really seems to me that the words "are sent by mail" should not be inserted in the thirteenth line of this section. Before this business can be carried on by anybody the party has got to give specific notice of where it is to be done and who is to do it; and there does not seem to me to be any difficulty in the world or that there can be any difficulty in giving personal notice. The forfeitures which are to follow upon a disobedience to this notice, it seems to me, are too severe to be entailed upon a notice sent through the mail.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can only say that we had letters and communications on the subject from several assessors stating that a good deal of embarrassment and expense were occasioned by the fact that they had to go in person all over their districts or send some one to give notice merely, and that, as a general rule, sending it by mail would be quite as certain. We proposed to insert those words on consideration for that reason. It was not done without consideration.

The next amendment was in section eighty-three, line nineteen, to strike out the words "such persons or parties interested" and insert "the manufacturers or producers thereof;" in line twenty-one to strike out "the manufacturers or producers of the same" and insert "the parties interested;" and in line twenty-eight, after "shall" to strike out "then be" and insert "be found."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-nine of section eighty-three, before "declared" to insert "by him;" and in line forty, after "over" to insert "by the collector."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following proviso, beginning at line forty-four of section eighty-three:

Provided, That the proceeds of the sale of said articles, if any there be after deducting the duties and additions thereon, together with the expenses of summons, advertising, and sale, or the excess of the value of said articles, after deducting the duties and additions and expenses accrued thereon when turned over to the use of any department of the Government, shall be refunded and paid to the owner, or, if he cannot be found, to the manufacturer or producer, or to the person in whose custody or possession the articles were when seized.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

And the proceeds of sale of said articles, if any there be after deducting the duties and additions thereon, together with the fees, costs, and expenses of all proceedings incident to the seizure and sale, to be determined by said Commissioner, shall be refunded and paid to the owner, or, if he cannot be found, to the manufacturer or producer in whose custody the articles were when seized, as the said Commissioner may deem just, by draft on the same or some other collector; or if the said articles are turned over without sale to the use of any department of the Government, the excess of the value of said articles, after deducting the amount of the duties, additions, fees, costs, and expenses accrued thereon when turned over as aforesaid, shall be refunded and paid by the said department to the owner, or, if he cannot be found, to the manufacturer or producer in whose custody or possession the said articles were when seized as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out, after "forfeited," in line eighty-two of section eighty-three, the words "as aforesaid."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eighty-six of section eighty-three, after the word "of" to strike out "this section as aforesaid" and insert "the eighty-first section of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out in lines eighty-eight, eighty-nine, and ninety, of section eighty-three, the words "cases of neglect or refusal to pay duties on manufactured articles or articles produced under the provisions of this act," and in lieu of them to insert:

This section; but before forfeiture shall be declared by virtue of the provisions of this section, the amount of duties which may be due from the person whose manufactures or products are seized shall first be ascertained in the manner prescribed in the eighty-fourth section of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ninety-seven of section eighty-three, after "fine" to insert "or penalty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and two of section eighty-three, after the word "given," to strike out "in the same manner as is provided in this section in case of forfeiture" and insert "as the said Commissioner shall prescribe."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eighty-five, after the word "aforesaid," in line twenty-two, to strike out "and subject to an ad valorem duty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eighty-five, line twenty-five, after the word "behalf" to insert:

And where such goods, wares, and merchandise have been removed for consumption or for delivery to others, or placed on shipboard, or are no longer within the custody or control of the manufacturer or his agent, not being in his factory, store, or warehouse, the value shall be estimated at the average of the market value of the like goods, wares, and merchandise at the time when the same became liable to duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-nine of section eighty-five, after the word "commission" to insert "not exceeding three per cent."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I have in my hand a paper received this morning addressed to the Committee on Finance, and with the consent of the Senate I will read it. It has reference to this subject, and after reading it I shall move that it be referred to that committee, and at the same time I give notice that I shall move when this bill comes into the Senate that "the reasonable commission not exceeding three per cent." be increased to the actual amount paid:

NEW YORK, May 25, 1864.

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, merchants in the city of New York, beg leave respectfully to ask your attention to section eighty-five in the new internal revenue law passed by the House of Representatives and now being considered by your honorable committee.

Said section provides that a manufacturer in making his return of goods shall only deduct from the full market value actual freight and three per cent. commission.

We think a manufacturer should be allowed what he actually has to pay to convert his goods into cash; which is for—

Packing boxes, freight, fire insurance, cartage, storage.....	1 1/2 per cent.
Commission.....	3 "
Guarantee for selling.....	3 "
As goods are usually sold on six months' credit—
Loss of interest.....	3 "

Total.....10 1/2 per cent.

Which we think, in justice to them, they should be allowed to deduct from their return to the inspector.

HUNT, TILLINGHURST & CO.,
HOYT, SPRAGUE & CO.

The honorable the Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Finance; and I give notice that I shall move to amend this clause when the bill comes into the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to move a verbal amendment in the forty-ninth line of the eighty-fifth section. I move to strike out the words "used or" before "consumed," as they are entirely unnecessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-six of section eighty-six, to strike out the words "assessor or," and after "assistant assessor" in line thirty-seven to insert "of the proper assessment district."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line forty of section eighty-six to strike out the words "provided that" and insert "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eighty-six, line forty-four, to strike out "one" and insert "three," so as to read, "a penalty of $300."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eighty-six, line forty-six, to strike out "six months" and insert "one year," so as to read, "imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the eighty-seventh section, line twelve, after the word "shall" to insert "preserve the same in his office," and to strike out "transmit the same to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. And the said assessor shall, on the 1st days of January and July of each year, transmit to said Department a statement in writing showing all changes in or additions to said record of such manufacturers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The next amendment of the Committee on Finance is to strike out the eighty-ninth section and insert in lieu of it—

Mr. CLARK. I hardly think it is necessary to read the part proposed to be stricken out; but there is a mistake in the printing of the bill. A portion of that section should not be stricken out; and before the question is taken on striking out, I move to amend by making the word "stem" before "tobacco" on the 121st page, in the thirty-sixth line of the section, "stemmed."

Mr. HENDERSON. What will be the effect of the amendment the Senator proposes? Will it be to class stemmed tobacco with tobacco that is taxed under this bill?

Mr. CLARK. Not at all. This is only a provision for storage and exportation.

Mr. HENDERSON. I notice that on page 144 the bill does provide for taxing stemmed tobacco or what is called strips.

Mr. CLARK. It does; but this is a provision for storing it in bonded warehouses and for exportation.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand it provides only for storing that quality of tobacco which is taxed. There is no necessity for providing for storing the tobacco in the leaf until it is manufactured in some shape so as to incur the tax.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is mistaken. This stemmed tobacco is prepared and mainly exported; and the amendment is desired by the exporters and raisers of tobacco. It is a provision for transporting it from the place of stemming to a bonded warehouse, so that it may go out of the country without paying a tax.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand that the stemming is done in a particular place? According to the information I have received, it is sometimes done by the producer on his farm.

Mr. CLARK. At a particular place. A difficulty arises in regard to the ambiguity of the language resulting from what may be the broad or narrow construction of the word "manufactured." If stemming the leaf, taking out the stem, is the manufacture of tobacco, we should not need this amendment; but it is doubtful whether that may be considered a manufacture, so that the committee desire to insert the words "or place of stemming" after "manufacture," in line thirty-eight, so that they may transport it directly from the place of manufacture or place of stemming to a bonded warehouse.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to state for the information of the Senate, those who may not understand this process, that my understanding of stemmed tobacco is strips—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say to the Senator that on this amendment, the question of the tax on stemmed tobacco does not come up. Although we provide here for depositing it in warehouses, he can move to strike out the stemmed tobacco afterwards. There is no such thing as "stem tobacco," as it is spelled now, and therefore we want to make it as we intended it to be by substituting "stemmed." Then if the Senator chooses he can move to strike it all out, and that will be another question.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not desire to discuss this matter, but to make a single remark. Since the blocking up of the Mississippi river, the farmers in the West, I suppose very generally now, stem the tobacco in order to save transportation. The stem itself is like the stalk, only it is smaller. It is no more the manufacture of the tobacco than is the taking out of the stalk. As I understand the bill now, if a farmer in my State, in order to save the cost of transportation by railroad, stems the tobacco (for he can take the stems and sell them in St. Louis or Cincinnati, where they are manufactured into snuff, while the stalk is sent to Boston, or New York, or Philadelphia, and there manufactured) he will be compelled to pay a tax of thirty-five cents, and the manufacturer in the East will also have to pay a tax of thirty-five cents. It cuts the leaf into two pieces, and he will be compelled to pay twenty-five cents tax, and the manufacturer in New York will also have to pay thirty-five cents on the article when manufactured. The Senate will understand that stemming is the first process of manufacture; it takes the stem out; but it is by no means a manufacture of tobacco. If these words be retained here, the provision will be very hard on the farmers of the West, who have to ship their tobacco to the East now over railroads.

Mr. CLARK. No such question as the Senator from Missouri suggests arises here. There is no question of taxation here. This provides only a process by which we authorize the growers to remove this stemmed tobacco, or strips, as he calls it, from the place where the stripping is done to the bonded warehouse, there to remain until exported.

Mr. HENDERSON. Without payment of duties, which implies that it cannot be used without payment of duties.

Mr. CLARK. Exactly, and for the purpose of going into the bonded warehouse it does not pay any duty.

Mr. HENDERSON. But you do not require the leaf when the stem is in it to go into bonded warehouse for shipment.

Mr. CLARK. Not at all.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want this to remain exactly as leaf tobacco, because it is nothing else than leaf tobacco.

Mr. CLARK. As the committee understand, tobacco is generally stripped, and goes into the bonded warehouse to be exported, and this provision applies only to the stemmed tobacco. If the Senator desires to have some other classes of tobacco included, he can move that as a separate amendment, but it does not apply to this.

Mr. HENDERSON. The proviso is "that manufactured tobacco, stem tobacco," as it is now, or "stemmed tobacco," as the amendment would make it, "snuff, or cigars may be transferred without payment of the duty" to the bonded warehouse.

Mr. CLARK. Exactly.

Mr. HENDERSON. But that implies that stemmed tobacco must pay a duty. I do not want that implication, because it is nothing but leaf tobacco. It is true that no tobacco is ever manufactured until it is stemmed, nor is it manufactured until the stalk is taken off; but stemming is not manufacturing it. Taking the leaf off the stalk is called stripping. Taking the large fiber, the stem, out of the leaf is called stemming. No tobacco is manufactured until it has undergone both operations.

Mr. CLARK. The committee desired to provide that manufactured tobacco might be removed to a bonded warehouse without paying the duty.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is not manufactured tobacco.

Mr. CLARK. Here is a provision that manufactured tobacco may be so removed. The Senate understands that. Then there is another provision that stemmed tobacco may also be removed without payment of the duty. That is what the committee intend by it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not want it to pay any duty.

Mr. CLARK. The committee do not. That is what we are trying to come at.

Mr. HENDERSON. Does the Senator from New Hampshire mean to say that if the stemmed tobacco is used in this country it must pay a duty?

Mr. CLARK. We do mean to say that if it is used in this country the stemmed tobacco when so manufactured and made up shall pay a duty.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do you mean to say that stemming tobacco is manufacturing it?

Mr. CLARK. We do not undertake to decide that by putting in this amendment, but only to allow them to take it from the place of stemming to the bonded warehouse.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator from Missouri will wait until we get over to the provision imposing the duty, we can settle that question then.

Mr. CLARK. This has no application to that.

Mr. POWELL. If the provision of this bill on page 144 remains, placing this tax at thirty-five cents a pound on stemmed tobacco, it is eminently proper that this proviso should remain and be amended as indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire. Stemming tobacco, that is, taking the central fiber out of the leaf, is carried on for the purpose of shipping the leaf abroad to the British empire. It all goes there. They take out the central stem for the purpose of avoiding the tax in that country, which is very heavy. The planters estimate the central stem to be one third in weight of the leaf, and by taking out that central stem, which is of very little comparative value, they send the strips abroad and avoid one third of the duty in Great Britain. I do not suppose there is a manufacturer of tobacco in the United States that ever bought a hoghead of strip for the purpose of consumption here or working it up. This proviso relieves them from the necessity of paying the tax here, and allows them to put it in their warehouse for the purpose of shipping, and then to transmit it to a bonded warehouse without paying any duty whatever. It is very important, therefore, that these words "or place of stemming" should be inserted, because the stemming of tobacco is not manufacturing tobacco; it is all leaf, and remains leaf. I think it would be much better to strike out the provision so that there should be no tax on stemmed tobacco, because I think all of it is exported; but this provision is very important if amended as indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire, because it will save us the payment of the duty when we export from this country, and there will be no drawback connected with it. I hope the amendment indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire will be adopted. The question whether we shall place a tax on stemmed tobacco will come up afterwards.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. In the forty-fourth line the same words should be inserted after the word "warehouse," "or place of stemming," so that it will read:

And may be transported from such warehouse or place of stemming to a bonded warehouse.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. In the fifty-first line the word "stem" before the word "tobacco" should be "stemmed," and the same amendment should be made in the fifty-third line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Now I desire to transfer the whole of that proviso at the close of the original eighty-ninth section to the end of the new section proposed to be inserted by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection. The question now is on striking out the eighty-ninth section of the bill and inserting what will be read by the Secretary in lieu thereof.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Sec. 89. And be it further enacted, That any person, firm, company, or corporation, now or hereafter engaged in the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, or cigars of any description whatsoever, shall be, and hereby is, required to make out and deliver to the assistant assessor of the assessment district a true statement or inventory of the quantity of each of the different kinds of tobacco, snuff, cigars, cigars, tin-foil, liquorice, and stems held or owned by him or them on the day this act takes effect or at the time of commencing business under this act, setting forth what portion of said goods was manufactured or produced by him or them, and what was purchased from others, whether chewing, smoking, fine-cut, shorts, pressed, plug, snuff-flour, or prepared snuff, the several kinds of cigars and the market price thereof, which statement or inventory shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of such person or persons, and be in manner and form as prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and the said person, firm, company, or corporation engaged as aforesaid, on the first day of January in every year hereafter, shall make out and deliver to the said assistant assessor a true statement or inventory, in manner and form as aforesaid and verified as aforesaid, of all such articles aforesaid, then held or owned by him or them, setting forth all and singular what is required to be set forth in the statement or inventory first aforesaid; and every such person, company, or corporation shall keep in a book, in such manner and form as said Commissioner may prescribe, an accurate account of all the articles aforesaid thereafter purchased by him or them, the quantity of tobacco, snuff, snuff-flour, or cigars, of whatever description, sold, consumed, or removed for consumption or sale, or removed from the place of manufacture; and he or they shall, on Wednesday of each week, furnish to the assistant assessor of the district a true and accurate copy of the entries in said book during the week ending on the preceding Saturday, which copy shall be verified by oath or affirmation, on the receipt whereof an assessment of the duties due by said person, company, or corporation shall be immediately made and transmitted to the collector of the district, to whom said duties shall be paid within five days thereafter; and in case the duties shall not be paid within the said five days, the said collector may, on one day's notice, distrain for the same, with ten per cent. additional on the amount thereof, subject to all the provisions of law relating to licenses, returns, assessments, payment of taxes, liens, fines, penalties and forfeitures, not inconsistent herewith in the case of other manufacturers; and such duty shall be paid by the manufacturer whether manufacturing for himself or others: Provided, That it shall be the duty of any manufacturer or vendor of tin-foil used in covering manufactured tobacco, on demand of any officer of internal revenue, to render to such officer a correct statement, verified by oath or affirmation, of the quantity and amount of tin-foil sold or delivered to any person or persons named in such demand; and in case of refusal or neglect to render such statement, or of cause to believe such statement to be incorrect or fraudulent, the assessor of the district may cause an examination of persons, books, and papers to be made in the same manner as provided in the fourteenth section of this act: Provided, That manufactured tobacco, stemmed tobacco, snuff, or cigars, may be transferred, without payment of the duty, directly from the place of manufacture or place of stemming to a bonded warehouse established in conformity with law and Treasury regulations, under such rules and regulations and upon the execution of such transportation bonds as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; said bonds or other security to be taken by the assessor of the district from which such removal is made, and may be transported from such warehouse or place of stemming to a bonded warehouse used for the storage of merchandise at any port of entry and withdrawn therefrom for consumption or payment of the duty or removed for export to a foreign country without payment of duty, in conformity with the provisions of this act relating to the removal of distilled spirits; all the rules, regulations, and conditions of which, so far as applicable, shall apply to tobacco, stemmed tobacco, snuff, or cigars, in bonded warehouse. And no drawback shall in any case be allowed upon any manufactured tobacco, stemmed tobacco, snuff, or cigars, upon which any excise duty has been paid either before or after it has been placed in bonded warehouse.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken on that amendment, it seems to me we ought to understand what is meant by stemmed tobacco. I was at the trouble of making some inquiry out of the Senate on this subject of a person whose duty it is to understand it, and according to the information that I gained there is no material difference between stemmed tobacco and tobacco in the leaf. The greater part of the stemmed tobacco is still in the hands of the producer on his farm or plantation, whatever it may be. As I understand it, the stem, which is of no value, is extracted from the leaf. The leaf is relieved of that useless part. I understand that that in a just sense is no part of the manufacture of tobacco, but it is a process by which the leaf is brought into marketable condition. I may have been misinformed; but that is the information I received; and according to that information it seemed to me that the Senate was unconsciously, perhaps, approaching a very important question, and that is, the tax on tobacco in the leaf. On reflecting upon that tax I think there is much to be said in favor of it. I do not know that there is any way in which we could so easily raise from twenty to fifty million dollars of money; that is according as we made the tax ten cents or twenty cents a pound. But then if we do impose that tax I want to impose it knowing what I do. I do not want to impose it under another phrase which may mean or may not mean that. I throw out these observations founded on certain inquiries which I have made. I may have been misinformed, however.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Massachusetts is undoubtedly correct. We understand by stemmed tobacco the tobacco out of which the stem has been taken, or stripped tobacco, so as to save the transportation of the bulky part of the stem. What the committee designed by this provision is to allow that tobacco, after it has been stripped from the stem, or the stem extracted, to be removed to a bonded warehouse and exported from the country without payment of duty. This is not a question of imposing any tax upon it at all. There is no question of a tax raised here in this clause, or in any other.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before going any further, I will make the motion of which I gave notice yesterday, that at half past four o'clock the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. Why not say half past six?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Seven o'clock is as early as we can get together.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest half past seven o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Two hours and a half, from half past four till seven, will do, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand whether the Senator moved the recess for this day only or daily.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move it for this day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that at half past four o'clock to-day the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section ninety, line two, after the word "manufacturer," to strike out the words "or maker;" in line ten, after the word "manufacturer," to strike out the words "or maker;" in line twelve, before the word "forfeiting," to strike out the words "such manufacturer or maker;" in line fourteen, after the word "manufacturer," to strike out the words "or maker;" in line sixteen, after the word "manufacturer," to strike out the words "or maker;" and in line twenty, after the word "exceeding," to strike out the words "six months" and insert "one year;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 90. And be it further enacted, That every manufacturer of tobacco, stemmed tobacco, snuff, or cigars of any description, as heretofore mentioned, or his chief workman, agent, or superintendent, shall, at the end of each and every month, make and sign a declaration, in writing, that no such article or commodity, as aforesaid, has, during such preceding month or time when the last declaration was made, been removed, carried, or sent, or caused, or suffered, or known to have been removed, carried, or sent, from the premises of such manufacturer other than such as have been duly assessed and the duties imposed by law paid thereon, on pain of forfeiting for every refusal or neglect to make such declaration $100. And if any such manufacturer, or his chief workman, agent, or superintendent, shall make any false or untrue declaration, such manufacturer, or chief workman, agent, or superintendent, making the same, upon conviction thereof, shall forfeit $300, or, at the discretion of the court, be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. Is it in order to move to amend the section just read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will entertain the motion if there be no objection.

Mr. POWELL. I move to strike out the words "stemmed tobacco" in the second line.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we had better get through with the committee's amendments, and settle that question on the tax.

Mr. POWELL. Very well; I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

The next amendment was in section ninety-one, line four, to strike out the word "stem" and to insert the word "stemmed;" and in line fourteen, before the word "dollars" to strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 91. And be it further enacted, That if any person other than the manufacturer shall sell, or consign, or remove for sale, or part with the possession of any manufactured tobacco, stemmed tobacco, snuff, or cigars, upon which the duties imposed by law have not been paid, such person shall be liable to a penalty of $100 for each and every offense. And any person who shall purchase or receive for sale any such tobacco, stemmed tobacco, snuff, or cigars, upon which the duty has not been paid, with knowledge thereof, shall be liable to a penalty of $100 for each and every offense. And any person who shall purchase or receive for sale any such tobacco, stemmed tobacco, snuff, or cigars from any manufacturer who has not a permit to manufacture, shall be liable for each and every offense to a penalty of fifty dollars, and, in addition thereto, a forfeiture of all the articles, as aforesaid, so purchased or received, or the full value thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ninety-two, line five, to strike out the word "annual" before "product;" in line six to strike out the word "sum" and insert "rate," and after the word "dollars" to insert "per annum;" in line nine to strike out the word "annual" before "product;" in line ten to strike out the words "the sum of $600" and to insert the words "such rate;" in line eleven to strike out the word "sum" and insert "rate," and after the word "dollars" to strike out the words "the sum of $600 shall be exempt, and;" in line thirteen after the word "collected" to insert the word "only," and after the word "above" to insert the words "the rate of;" and in line fourteen, after the word "dollars" to insert the words "per annum;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 92. And be it further enacted, That all goods, wares, and merchandise, or articles manufactured or made (except refined petroleum, refined coal oil, gold and silver, spirituous and malt liquors, manufactured tobacco, and snuff and cigars) by any person or firm, where the product shall not exceed the rate of $600 per annum, and shall be made or produced by the labor of such person or firm, or by his or their family, shall be, and are, exempt from duty; where the product shall exceed such rate and not exceed the rate of $1,000, the duty shall be levied, assessed, and collected only upon the excess above the rate of $600 per annum; and in all other cases the whole annual product, including any business or transaction where one party has been furnished with materials, or any part thereof, and employed by another party to manufacture, make, or finish the goods, wares, and merchandise, or articles, paying or promising to pay therefor, and to whom the same are returned when so made and finished, shall be assessed and the duty paid thereon by the producer or manufacturer: Provided, That whenever a producer or manufacturer shall use, or shall remove for consumption or use, any article, goods, wares, or merchandise, which if removed for sale would be liable to taxation, he shall be assessed upon the salable value of the articles, goods, wares, or merchandise so used or so removed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to change the phraseology in that proviso a little. In line twenty-two, I move to strike out the word "use" and insert "consume," and in line twenty-three I move to strike out the words "or use;" so that it will read:

Provided, That whenever a producer or manufacturer shall consume, or shall remove for consumption, any articles, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary proceeded to read the ninety-third section of the bill.

Mr. POWELL. In the fourteenth line of the ninety-third section, after the word "coal," I move to amend by inserting the words "and coal mined and used exclusively for the distillation of coal oil." I think it eminently proper that those words should be inserted. I understand it was the original intention of the committee of the House of Representatives to make the clause read in that way. The remnant of coal after it has been used for the distillation of oil is utterly worthless. I do not think the coal used exclusively for the purpose of being made into oil should be subject to the tax that is imposed by this section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is not subject to it now.

Mr. POWELL. Those who wish to protect that interest think it is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This relates to the manufacture of foreign coal altogether.

Mr. POWELL. Oh, no, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That coal will pay its duty in the first place at the mine.

Mr. POWELL. I wish to prevent that by inserting these words: "and coal mined and used exclusively for the distillation of coal oil." That will exclude it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There will be no reason in that whatever.

Mr. POWELL. I think there is a very good reason for it. This clause proposes to lay a tax on the coal, and then the bill lays a tax on the oil. I do not think the business can stand the double tax.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That would only be giving Kentucky a preference over other places.

Mr. POWELL. Kentucky has very little interest in the question, comparatively. Other States are more interested than Kentucky. West Virginia has much more interest in this matter than Kentucky, and so has Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky at this time, unless objection be made to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would rather go through with the committee's amendments first. The Senator can make a memorandum of it, and offer it afterwards.

Mr. POWELL. This is a very short amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I could not allow it to be inserted now without further examination.

Mr. POWELL. Well, I will withdraw it for the present.

The next amendment of the committee was in section ninety-three, line twenty-five, to strike out the words "five hundred thousand cubic feet per month, a duty of twenty cents per thousand cubic feet" in the following clause: "on gas, illuminating, made of coal, wholly or in part, or any other material, when the product shall be not above five hundred thousand cubic feet per month, a duty of twenty cents per one thousand cubic feet," and to insert in lieu thereof "two hundred thousand cubic feet per month, a duty of ten cents per one thousand cubic feet; when the product shall be above two and not exceeding five hundred thousand cubic feet per month, a duty of fifteen cents per one thousand cubic feet."

Mr. SUMNER. I suppose the committee have looked into this subject, but still the scale that has been adopted is not according to the information that I have received. I venture to suggest that "five cents" should be substituted for "ten cents" in the twenty-eighth line. In making that suggestion I wish to remark that I am for the highest tax that is practicable; but according to the information I have received this tax of ten cents where there is but two hundred thousand cubic feet of gas per month manufactured will operate to extinguish those comparatively small concerns, and therefore the Government will get nothing out of them. I am assured from a quarter well informed on this subject that five cents is as much as those small concerns manufacturing only at the rate of two hundred thousand cubic feet per month can pay. My information, of course, cannot be as extensive as that of the committee; it may be found, on inquiry, inadequate; but it is such as produced an impression on my mind; and therefore I throw out the suggestion. I do not care about making a motion on the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We carefully examined that subject on a communication from a gentleman from Massachusetts, and came to the opinion that this was the proper rate to fix. It will make too great a distinction to put it down to five cents in the first case. The Senator will see that we have struck off one half when the product is above that amount.

Mr. SUMNER. I observe that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is as low as we can make it, considering the other rates.

Mr. SUMNER. As the Senator says that the subject has been looked into carefully by the committee, I shall not press the suggestion.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ninety-three, line thirty-four, after the word "twenty" to strike out the word "five," and in line thirty-five to strike out the word "thirty" and insert "twenty-five;" so that the clause will read:

When the product shall be above five hundred thousand and not exceeding five million cubic feet per month, a duty of twenty cents per one thousand cubic feet; when the product shall be above five million, a duty of twenty-five cents per one thousand cubic feet.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ninety-three, line eighty, after the word "purpose" to insert the following proviso:

And provided also, That naphtha of specific gravity exceeding eighty degrees, according to Baume's hydrometer, and of the kind usually known as gasoline, shall be subject to a tax of five per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ninety-three, line ninety-nine, to strike out the following clause:

On molasses, sirup of molasses, concentrated molasses or melado, and cistern bottoms, produced directly from the sugar-cane and not made from sorghum or imphee, and on cane juice, when removed from the plantation, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

On molasses produced from the sugar-cane, and not from sorghum or imphee, a duty of six cents per gallon.

On sirup of molasses or sugar-cane juice, when removed from the plantation, concentrated molasses or melado, and cistern bottoms, of sugar produced from the sugar-cane and not made from sorghum or imphee, a duty of one cent and one fourth of one cent per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ninety-three, line one hundred and eleven, to strike out the word "directly" in the following clause:

On brown or Muscovado sugar not above No. 12, Dutch standard in color, produced directly from the sugar-cane and not from sorghum or imphee, other than those produced by the refiner, a duty of two cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ninety-three, line one hundred and eighteen, to strike out the word "three" and insert "two and one half;" so that the clause will read:

On all clarified or refined sugars above No. 12 and not above No. 18, Dutch standard in color, produced directly from the sugar-cane and not from sorghum or imphee, a duty of two and one half cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ninety-three, line one hundred and twenty-two, to strike out "four" and insert "three and one half;" so that the clause will read:

On all clarified or refined sugars above No. 18, Dutch standard in color, produced directly from the sugar-cane and not from sorghum or imphee, a duty of three and one half cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ninety-three, line one hundred and thirty-seven, after the word "cents" to insert "per pound;" so that the clause will read:

On sugar candy, and all confectionery made wholly or in part of sugar, valued at not exceeding twenty cents per pound, a duty of two cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ninety-three, line one hundred and fifty-three, after the word "twenty" to insert "eight;" in line one hundred and fifty-four, after the word "twenty" to insert "eight;" in line one hundred and fifty-five, after the word "thirty" to insert "eight;" and in line one hundred and fifty-seven, after the word "thirty" to insert "eight;" so that the clause will read:

On gunpowder, and all explosive substances used for mining, blasting, artillery, or sporting purposes, when valued at twenty-eight cents per pound or less, a duty of one cent per pound; when valued at above twenty-eight cents per pound and not exceeding thirty-eight cents per pound, a duty of one and a half cent per pound; and when valued at above thirty-eight cents per pound, a duty of eight cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ninety-three, line one hundred and eighty-two, to strike out "ten" and insert "five;" so that the clause will read:

On screws, commonly called wood screws, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ninety-three, after line two hundred and sixteen to insert the following clause:

On photographs, or any other sun picture, being copies of engravings or works of art, or used for the illustration of books, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ninety-three, line two hundred and twenty-one, after the word "articles" to insert "except vessels propelled exclusively by sails;" so that the clause will read:

On all repairs of engines, cars, carriages, or other articles, except vessels propelled exclusively by sails, when such repairs increase the value of the article so repaired ten per cent, or over, a duty of three per cent. on such increased value.

Mr. SHERMAN. That exception ought not to be extended at any rate beyond vessels employed in the foreign trade.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken about that. This does not apply to the question of freight.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not speak of that, but of vessels on our western lakes. I know nothing about the commerce on the Atlantic seaboard, and therefore cannot speak about it; but the building of vessels on the western lakes has now become an enormous business, and there is no reason why the building of those vessels should not be taxed just the same as the building of steam vessels. There may be reasons operating on the Atlantic coast why this duty should not be imposed, but certainly they do not operate on the western lakes. I have heard this discrimination and also the other one in regard to the freights complained about. I cannot see any reason why this tax should not be imposed. There are now extensive ship-yards in Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Buffalo, and other points, in which they are building a great number of vessels for commerce on the lakes, and very profitably.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator does not understand it, I think. The reason why this exception is made is simply this: our neighbors in the British provinces can build vessels so much cheaper than we can that if we put a tax on the business of building vessels that business will fall exclusively into their hands. That is the great trouble.

Mr. SHERMAN. That may be true along the seaboard, but certainly that reason does not apply on the lake shores, where they cannot get the facilities to do so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They will get the facilities if it is found that it is so much cheaper for them to build vessels. The result will be precisely this, that the business of building vessels will fall into their hands. That is the reason why the House of Representatives passed the section on this subject which they did pass by a very large vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I ask why this duty should not apply to steamboats as well as sailing vessels.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because they have not gone into the business of building steamboats in the provinces.

Mr. SHERMAN. The argument is precisely the same. I have heard this argument suggested in reference to the Atlantic coast, that there is the competition to be looked to in the building of the vessels; but that is not the case with the commerce of the lakes, which is said now to be equal to our commerce on the ocean. The transportation of wheat in these vessels is immense, and it is increasing. The number of steamboats is decreasing and the number of sailing vessels is increasing; and I do not see why the manufacture of those vessels should not pay a tax.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator confounds the question of building the vessels and the question of freight.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. I say here is a tax on the building of vessels, a discrimination against the building of steamboat vessels in favor of the vessels propelled by sails. It reads now, as it came from the House:

On all repairs of engines, cars, carriages, or other articles, when such repairs increase the value of the article so repaired ten per cent. or over, a duty of three per cent. on such increased value.

The House made no discrimination; but it is proposed now to make a discrimination, and to amend the clause so that it will read:

On all repairs of engines, cars, carriages, or other articles, except vessels propelled exclusively by sails, when such repairs increase the value of the article so repaired ten per cent. or over, a duty of three per cent. on such increased value.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken again. The House did make a discrimination.

Mr. SHERMAN. Where?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Over in the last part of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. On freight?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir. The one hundred and seventy-sixth section declares:

That the tax levied in section ninety three shall not be held to apply to vessels propelled exclusively by sails.

The committee simply propose to transfer that provision to section ninety-three. That proposition, after a debate in the House, was adopted by a very large vote because so many persons there knew the fact. But the House also made a discrimination, and I think without much thought and unwisely, on the question of freight. That discrimination, I think, should not be made, at any rate so far as the coasting trade is concerned, and it was upon that subject that I spoke to the Senator.

The reason why this discrimination does not apply to steam vessels is this: steamers are a different kind of manufacture into which the British provinces have not gone for want of capital and facilities. The time may come when we shall be obliged to take off the duty on the building of those vessels. But they can build sailing vessels with just as much facility as we can. If the Senator was familiar with it, he would know that wherever there is a harbor with a sufficient depth of water they can build them, and it requires no outlay of capital. We have imposed so many heavy duties on everything that goes into the manufacture of a ship that if we impose a duty also on the manufacture itself we shall destroy the ship-building interest not only here but on the lakes. It is a different question from the question of freight.

Mr. SHERMAN. With due deference to the Senator, I must confess that I cannot see it. The question is on taxing the manufacture of ships, and I can see no reason for taxing the manufacture of steamboats that will not apply to sailing vessels. On the Atlantic coast, where our manufactures of sailing vessels are brought into more direct competition with all the world, there may be a reason why this tax should not be applied to vessels there, although I cannot see that very strongly. It is said it is a discrimination against our manufactures. All internal taxes are a discrimination against our own manufactures, because we cannot impose a tax in this bill on the manufactures of other countries, and therefore to some extent all these taxes are a discrimination against our own industry. But there may be reasons in regard to the building of vessels on the Atlantic seaboard that would operate against this tax, but they cannot operate; it seems to me, in the interior portions of the country. In Canada they build but a very few vessels. They have their own tax laws. We build a large number. Now, if a person should embark his capital in building a steamboat, even the hull of a steamboat, which may be manufactured on the Canadian side and floated across to our side, filled with iron and machinery, he would have to pay the tax.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That would be a very good reason for striking it all out.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see any reason why the tax should not apply to the building of all vessels.

Mr. COLLAMER. Neither do I.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Maine seems to think it so perfectly clear that I am somewhat confused that I cannot see it. The Senator from Vermont says he cannot. I think there is no reason for it. I believe, that the shipping interest on the Atlantic coast and in the interior could bear a reasonable and moderate tax. This is but three per cent. in one case and two per cent. in another. I believe that all of them could bear it a great deal better than other people can bear many of the other taxes imposed by this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. It seems very clear to me that if there is any discrimination in this tax it should be in favor of steam vessels rather than of sailing vessels. It is very well known that the materials of which steam vessels are made are much more complex and pay a much larger revenue in the way of indirect and direct taxation prior to their going into those vessels. Then it is likewise well known that your sailing craft come in direct competition with your steam craft, and it is manifestly unjust to discriminate against the steam vessels. We all know it is very much more expensive running a steam vessel than a sailing vessel. We all know that sail vessels have a most decided advantage in the way of low freight. They can freight much lower than the steam vessels. The competition is very great. The steam vessels cost much more to run than the sailing vessels; and I really do not see the force of the argument of the Senator from Maine.

The Senator says that if this tax should be imposed they will build vessels in Canada and bring them here. Why, sir, they cannot be naturalized in this country without a special act of Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They can make a sale to our citizens, as a matter of course.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not as a matter of course by any means. On the contrary, unless a vessel has been repaired and I think either three fourths or four fifths of her value placed upon her in the shape of repairs in this country she cannot get an American register, and there are very few exceptions where registers have been granted unless a very large share of the value of the vessel was placed upon her in American waters. I repeat, I cannot see the force of the argument of the Senator from Maine. In my judgment, this is an unjust discrimination against the vessels propelled by steam, and in favor of those propelled by sails. I hope the proposition of the Senator from Ohio will be adopted and that no such discrimination will be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think Senators in their anxiety to accomplish a purpose for the lakes do not make a proper distinction, and, with great deference to them, I think they are confounding the two questions of freight and the building of vessels. The argument of the Senator from Michigan mixes the two questions up together. I agree with him that sailing vessels can carry cheaper comparatively, but they cannot carry freights so often; they cannot do the business with so much facility as steamers.

The argument of both Senators might apply very well, if they think there is any difficulty about it, to the building of steamers. The real truth of the matter is that the contest arises and has arisen there on the lakes between the owners of steamers and the owners of sailing vessels. The owners of steamers contend that the sailing vessels should be made to pay freight. That is true to a very great extent; I agree to it. I see no reason why they should not; that is to say, all that are engaged in what is called the coasting business. But with regard to these vessels, we cannot by our treaties now prevent the owner of a foreign vessel, a vessel trading to foreign ports, from bringing cargoes to our own ports. They do it with the same facility and on the same terms precisely that our own vessels do. There is no discrimination against them. I speak of course of British vessels, with whom we have the greatest business; and we may just as well consider all others as of no comparative consequence. Into that question the cost of building the vessels enters most materially. In our country at present we are obliged to impose very heavy duties on iron and cordage and a great many materials of that kind which enter into the composition of a vessel. Even without this tax we cannot build a vessel, and have never been able to build a vessel, as cheap as they do in the British provinces. The labor is much cheaper with them. If you burden the building of these vessels so heavily they will be enabled almost at any time to monopolize our foreign trade; that is, taking cargoes to the West India islands and bringing cargoes from there home, without any very considerable difficulty. Those employed in the coasting trade, as I said before, ought to pay a tax on freight. I have never known a case where a vessel was purchased where an American register was refused to it by an act of Congress if desired.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator would explain what difficulty there is practically in the way of protecting ship-building on the Atlantic coast against this competition either through your registration laws or through your tariff laws.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You can protect it undoubtedly if you will prevent foreign vessels from bringing cargoes to our shores.

Mr. HOWE. That is the freighting business; this is the manufacturing business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Undoubtedly; but does not the Senator perceive that the expense of freight, the power to make freight, depends very materially on the cost of the vessel? Can a vessel which costs twice as much as another carry freight as cheap? The Senator will see that cannot be done; and you cannot possibly exclude them, such is the state of our treaties and our business. The fact is at present that we cannot build a vessel anywhere near so cheap, leaving this duty out of the question, as the provinces can build them; and if in addition to the duties that are piled upon all that goes into the manufacture of a vessel you put a duty of this kind on the business of manufacturing, you heap upon it a burden that it will be unable to bear.

If Senators will inquire into the matter it will be found probably that they have not gone into the business of making vessels on the lakes to so large an extent as we have; they have not any foreign trade on the lakes, and the reason does not apply there as it does to the Atlantic coast. The question is, whether you have a disposition to break down a business which is so important as the business of building sailing vessels in connection with our commerce. I say they should pay a duty on freight, and the bill should be amended in that particular for this reason: because our laws exclude foreign vessels entirely from the coasting trade; they cannot enter into competition with us; and therefore you may put a duty upon the freight of sailing vessels engaged in our coasting trade; but you cannot put a duty upon the freight of vessels engaged in the foreign trade, because if you do you only take another step to drive our commerce entirely from the ocean. The Senator from Michigan, as the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and understanding this question, is quite as familiar, or more familiar, with these facts than I am.

The House of Representatives, when the matter was explained to them, by a very large and decisive vote struck out this duty on the repair and manufacture of sailing vessels, as it was proper they should do. Although the reason for that exception does not apply upon the lakes, that is to say, so far as the building of vessels is concerned, because there is no foreign trade there, to the same extent, yet you cannot pass a law laying an excise duty that is not equal and the same through all sections of the country. You cannot pass an excise law applicable to the State of Vermont and not to the State of Maine. Therefore I say you cannot pass an excise law which shall apply to the Atlantic border and not apply to the lakes, or vice versa. That is the reason why we cannot make an exception. The Senator from Ohio says he will admit that perhaps the reasoning is true as applicable to the shipbuilding interest on the Atlantic border, but it does not apply to the shipbuilding interest on the lakes. You might make an exception if you saw fit, if you could do it constitutionally; but you cannot pass a law of this kind that shall apply to one section of the country and not to another section of the country. These excise laws must be equal.

This question affects my own State very materially, and it affects all the States on the Atlantic border; and I say to gentlemen that if you undertake to pile on these discriminating duties on the building of sailing vessels the result will be that you will break down the shipbuilding interest. Senators, whatever section of country they may represent, do not want to do that, I take it. For the sake of imposing those duties on the vessels upon the lakes they do not want to break down the shipbuilding interest on the Atlantic coast. In my judgment that would be almost the inevitable result; and that was the opinion to which the House of Representatives came. I beg Senators, therefore, to consider the question as it stands in the estimation of those who are most familiar with it.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator entirely misapprehends the commerce of the lakes. He says we have no foreign commerce. Why, sir, we build a very large number of ships, and they are engaged in foreign commerce. Then, again, a large proportion of the commerce of the lakes is done by sailing craft. I do not know what proportion, but I should think three fourths or four fifths of the whole commerce of the lakes is done by sailing vessels. I believe there are more tons of sailing vessels constructed and put afloat in the State of Michigan than there are in the State of Maine. All I claim is justice between the parties.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You are not exposed to competition with foreign trade.

Mr. CHANDLER. We have a foreign trade. We have a regular line from Detroit to Europe. There are just as regular lines between Detroit and Liverpool as there are between New York and Liverpool, only there are not quite so many of them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. About two vessels a year.

Mr. CHANDLER. Thirty-eight. We build a very large number of these sailing vessels of a certain draught and size, that go through the locks, for sale.

All I claim is justice between the parties. The owners of steam vessels on the lakes say, "We are willing to pay our tax for the support of the Government, but give us justice; we come in competition every day with the sailing craft and they can underbid us; why will you tax us and relieve the sailing vessels?" I can see no reason on earth for the distinction. It seems to me to be a manifest injustice without any reason whatever. So it strikes me. I may be mistaken. I think I am not.

Mr. HOWE. I live on the lakes myself, and I cannot conceive of any lake interest that we are going to protect or promote by imposing a tax on the building of sail vessels on the lakes, especially if the like manufacture is to be exempt from taxation on the coast. The Senator from Maine insists, and I understand the Senator from Ohio concedes, that because of the competition between the building of sailing vessels in the British provinces and on the sea-coast in the United States they must be exempt from this tax there; but he still insists that the tax ought to be imposed upon the building of sail vessels on the lakes. My understanding is that the building of vessels on the lakes for sale on the coast is an established business; and I do not understand how we are going to promote the interests of that business. I do not understand why we do not strike a very injurious if not a deadly blow at it when we propose a tax of three or five per cent., or any other rate, on the building there and exempt the building on the Atlantic coast from a like tax. We give the building of sail vessels on the Atlantic coast a protection of whatever the rate of duty is over the building of those vessels on the lakes when we are trying and are building vessels there for sale on the coast, and selling them every year in large numbers. If, therefore, the building on the coast is to be exempt from duty, it seems to me of the utmost importance that no duty should be put upon the same manufacture on the lakes.

I confess I do not see the difficulty in the way of imposing a tax on this whole manufacture wherever they are built. The Senator from Maine argues that it will increase the cost of the vessel so much that it cannot compete in the market with the foreign-built vessel. I will inquire what is the rate of duty proposed, three or five per cent.?

Mr. SHERMAN. Two per cent.

Mr. HOWE. Then a vessel that will cost $100,000 would pay $2,000; and the argument is made here that to add $2,000 to the cost of the vessel would not enable it to compete with a foreign-built vessel in freighting. I should not have suspected that, and I hardly think it is true. I hardly think any such danger is to be anticipated. But if it is the judgment of the Senate that the building of any vessels should be exempted from the duty, I certainly hope all will be. I hope the building of vessels on the lakes will be put on an equal footing with the building of vessels anywhere.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state the history of this matter so far as it is presented on the face of the bill and as I remember the discussion in the House of Representatives.

The bill as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, taxed the building of all sail vessels two per cent., the building of hulls two per cent., and repairs three per cent. The House in the course of the debate inserted at the end of the bill the section referred to by the Senator from Maine. It was not reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, but introduced perhaps by a member from the State of Maine. It is the one hundred and seventy-sixth section of the bill:

That the tax levied in section ninety-three shall not be held to apply to vessels propelled exclusively by sails.

That was then made part of the bill and sent to us. The Committee on Finance of the Senate struck it out in the place where it was, and inserted it in this clause on page 135 of the bill.

There are two ideas contained in this bill: one is to levy a tax on everything that is to be consumed in this country, higher or lower. Scarcely a single article manufactured in this country is exempt from taxation; but we do exempt from taxation a large number of articles that are manufactured in this country and exported abroad. Even whisky may be exported abroad free of duty. That is the general principle of the bill, not to tax our productions which come into competition with the production of foreign countries.

When we came to apply these principles to the building of vessels we found this difficulty; there is no reason why vessels built in this country should not be taxed except that it might destroy or injure our own business in the competition with the building of foreign countries. That was the only reason that I know of for this exception. But as the tax is only two per cent. I am disposed to agree with the Senator from Wisconsin, and apply the tax to all. Certainly, if it is applied to steamboats it ought to be applied to sailing vessels. There is no reason for that distinction. I hope, therefore, we may have a vote on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance, and if that should be rejected it will leave the matter open to stand upon the House bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will agree, I presume, that this is precisely the same as the House provision, only it is put in the proper place.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already intimated that it is only a transposition; but the provision as it came to us in the bill was not a provision reported by the framers of the bill, but a section inserted on the motion of some member of the House.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does that make any difference?

Mr. SHERMAN. It does not make any difference; but it shows that the framers of this bill in contemplating and framing this system did not distinguish between sailing vessels and any other vessels.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The framers of the bill made no sort of objection to it when it was offered, but admitted its propriety.

Mr. SHERMAN. That I do not know anything about; but there is no reason for this distinction. There is no reason for exempting the manufacture of ships from this tax, unless the Senator from Maine or some other Senator can show that such an insignificant tax as two per cent. on the hull of a vessel would destroy our ship-building interest in the eastern States. It does not seem to me it can be so, because, if so, our taxes will prevent the building of steamboats and the building of all other vessels. I do not think a tax of two per cent. on the hull of a vessel will prevent any man from building ships in the State of Maine or any other State. It certainly would not prevent the building of any vessel in the West. This shipping interest is a very large one, and a tax of two per cent. upon all the vessels built in the United States will yield a very considerable sum of money, and I think we might as well apply it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment of the committee, and declared that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I must ask for the yeas and nays upon it. It is a matter that I deem to be of so much importance to my State that I want to have the expression of the Senate by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Johnson, Morgan, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, and Wade—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Howard, McDougall, Morrill, Riddle, Saulsbury, Wilkinson, and Wright—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in section ninety-three, line two hundred and twenty-five, to strike out the word "ships" before the word "steamboats," and after the word "vessels" to strike out the words "not propelled exclusively by sails;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That on such repairs made upon steamboats or other vessels, not propelled exclusively by sails, a duty of two per cent. only on the increased value shall be assessed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That amendment must be rejected according to the vote of the Senate just taken.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in section ninety-three, line two hundred and thirty, after the word "craft" to insert "except vessels propelled exclusively by sails."

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in section ninety-three, line two hundred and thirty-two, after the word "made" to strike out the word "or," and after the word "constructed" to insert the words "or finished;" so that the clause will read:

On the hulls, as launched, of all ships, barks, brigs, schooners, sloops, sail-boats, steamboats, canal-boats, and all other vessels or water craft (not including engines or rigging) hereafter built, made, constructed, or finished, a duty of two per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, the Senate will now take a recess, according to its order, until seven o'clock.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 26, 1864.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock, p. m.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives (No. 82) in relation to the distribution of books and documents was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the memorial of George W. Gaffit, a match manufacturer in New York, remonstrating against the mode of taxing friction matches as proposed by the tax bill now before Congress; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ANTHONY presented additional papers relating to the petition of C. A. Pitcher; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

DISLOYAL INDIANS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be instructed to report to the Senate what tribes of Indians are in arms against the Government of the United States, the location and extent of the reserves of such Indian tribes, the tenure by which they hold them, the amounts received by such tribes from the rebel authorities, and the dates when received, in the shape of annuities, and the amounts paid and expended by the Government of the United States for such Indian tribes since they were paid by the rebel authorities, and also the number of loyal and disloyal of such tribes.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I submitted yesterday morning a resolution of inquiry on the same subject, which was objected to by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Davis.] I should like to have that taken up and passed now. I move that it be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted yesterday:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be requested to consider the question of confiscating the reserves of all Indian tribes who are or have been in arms against the Government, and providing homes for the loyal members of such tribes; and to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was agreed to.

CONDITION OF FREEDMEN.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish to the Senate a copy of the preliminary report, and also of the final report of the American Freedman's Inquiry Commission, with the accompanying documents.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill, the amendments of the Committee on Finance being acted on as they were reached in their order.

The next amendment of the committee was after the word "wood," in line two hundred and fifty-two of section ninety-two, to strike out "having been;" so as to read:

That all furniture, or other articles made of wood, previously assessed, and a duty paid thereon, shall be assessed a duty of five per cent. ad valorem on the increased value, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the two hundred and forty-ninth line of this section. There seems to be some ambiguity about it:

On all furniture, or other articles made of wood, sold in the rough or unfinished, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

I do not see that there is any duty levied upon the article when finished. It seems to me that the qualification "sold in the rough or unfinished" applies to "all furniture or other articles made of wood," and there is no duty on the finished article.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see any ambiguity about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there any duty on furniture finished? What language covers it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will look to the last portion of the section he will see that all manufactured articles not enumerated and made of wood, leather, or anything else, pay a duty of five per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. A general provision of that kind would cover it.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and seventy-six of section ninety-two to strike out "four" and insert "three;" so as to read:

On blooms, slabs, or loops when made in forges or bloomeries, directly from the ore, a duty of three dollars per ton.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and ninety-two of section ninety-two, after the word "spikes" to strike out "and horseshoe nails when wrought by hand, kept for sale and not for the use of the maker in his trade;" and in line two hundred and ninety-seven to strike out "four" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

On band, hoop, and sheet iron, thinner than No. 18 wire gauge, plate iron less than one eighth of an inch in thickness, and cut nails and spikes, not including nails, tacks, brads, or finishing nails, usually put up and sold in papers, whether in papers or otherwise, nor horseshoe nails wrought by machinery, a duty of five dollars per ton.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. In the previous clause, on page 138, I notice a proviso "that a ton shall, for all the purposes of this act, be deemed and taken to be two thousand pounds." I ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if it is meant that this proviso shall refer to coal, a ton of which in all commercial parlance is twenty-two hundred and forty pounds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose it refers only to iron in that connection.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It appears to me to refer to the whole act. There is nothing to limit it.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let it go until we get through with the amendments of the committee. I will make a memorandum of it, and we can consider it afterwards.

The next amendment was in line three hundred and three of section ninety-two to strike out "one dollar" and insert "two dollars;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That bars, rods, bands, hoops, sheets, plates, nails, and spikes, not including such as are usually put up in papers; nor horseshoe nails wrought by machinery, as before mentioned, manufactured from iron, upon which the duty of three dollars has been levied and paid, shall be subject only to a duty of two dollars per ton in addition thereto, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line three hundred and seven of section ninety-two to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to make the clause read:

On iron castings used for bridges or other permanent structures, three dollars per ton.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "ton," in line three hundred and seven of section ninety-two, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That bar iron, used for like purposes, shall be charged with no additional duty beyond the specific duty imposed by this act when not increased in value more than ten per cent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line three hundred and fourteen of section ninety-two, to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

On stoves and hollow-ware and castings of iron exceeding ten pounds in weight for each casting, not otherwise provided for, a duty of five dollars per ton.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line three hundred and sixteen of section ninety-two, after the word "nuts" to insert "and washers not;" after the word "bolts" in line three hundred and seventeen to strike out "not less than four ounces in weight" and insert "exceeding five sixteenths of one inch in diameter;" and in line three hundred and eighteen to strike out "four" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

On rivets exceeding one fourth of one inch in diameter, nuts and washers not less than two ounces each in weight, and bolts exceeding five sixteenths of one inch in diameter, a duty of five dollars per ton.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the words "not less than" before "three," in line three hundred and twenty-two of section ninety-two, and in line three hundred and twenty-three to strike out "fifty cents" and insert "two dollars;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That when a duty upon the iron from which rivets, nuts, and bolts, as aforesaid, shall have been made, has been assessed and paid a duty of not less than three dollars per ton, a duty only, in addition thereto, shall be paid of two dollars per ton.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out "$1 50," in line three hundred and twenty-nine of section ninety-two, and to insert "three dollars;" so as to make the clause read:

Provided further, That all iron and castings of iron of all descriptions advanced beyond pig iron, blooms, slabs, or loops, upon which no duty has been assessed or paid in the form of pig iron, shall be assessed and paid, in addition to the foregoing rates of iron so advanced, a duty of three dollars per ton.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "smoked," in line three hundred and seventy-two of section ninety-two, to insert "when sold or removed for sale;" so as to make the clause read:

On oil-dressed leather and deer skins, dressed or smoked, when sold or removed for sale, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator has no objection to this amendment, I suppose.

Mr. HARRIS. No, sir; but I wish to make a suggestion. I desire to have this provision modified somewhat, and I will either propose my amendment now or wait—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Wait until we get through the amendments of the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line three hundred and ninety-eight of section ninety-two, to strike out "ten" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

On furs of all descriptions, when made up or manufactured, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The committee have directed me to offer the following proviso as an amendment after line three hundred and ninety-eight of section ninety-two:

Provided, That all manufactured furs on which a duty has been previously assessed and paid before manufacture shall be assessed only on the increased value thereof when so manufactured.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line four hundred and six of section ninety-two, after the word "shoes" to insert "gloves, mittens, and moccasins;" so as to make the clause read:

On ready-made clothing, boots and shoes, gloves, mittens, and moccasins, caps, hats, and bonnets, or other articles of dress for the wear of men, women, or children, five per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line four hundred and seventeen of section ninety-two, before "per cent." to strike out "five" and insert "three;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That any tailor, boot or shoemaker, hat, cap, or bonnet maker, milliner or dressmaker, exclusively engaged in manufacturing any of the foregoing articles to order as custom work and not for sale generally, who shall make affidavit to the assessor or assistant assessor that the entire amount of such manufactures so made does not exceed the sum of $600 per annum, shall be exempt from duty; when exceeding $600 per annum a duty of three per cent. ad valorem on the excess above $600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line four hundred

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1864.

NEW SERIES, No. 157.

and fifty-six of section ninety-two, after the word "manufacturing," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" so that the clause will read:

On cut smoking tobacco, made exclusively of stems, and not sweetened or otherwise prepared, and on shorts or other refuse separated from fine-cut tobacco in the process of manufacturing, fifteen cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line four hundred and sixty-two of section ninety-two, to insert:

On cigars known as cheroots or short sixes, made of refuse tobacco, and valued at not over seven dollars per thousand, three dollars per thousand.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line four hundred and sixty-six of section ninety-two, after the word "cigars" to insert "not otherwise provided for;" so that the clause will read:

On cigars, not otherwise provided for, valued at not over ten dollars per thousand, five dollars per thousand.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line four hundred and seventy-five of section ninety-two to insert:

And all tobacco and snuff manufactured after the passage of this act shall, before being removed from the place of manufacture, be inspected by an inspector of tobacco, and each box, barrel, hoghead, keg, bag, jar, bottle, bale, or other package branded or marked with the name of the tobacco or snuff, and the tax paid thereon, with the name of the manufacturer; and any box, barrel, hoghead, keg, bag, jar, bottle, bale, or other package removed from such place of manufacture, except to a bonded warehouse, without such inspection and brand shall be forfeited to the United States, and liable to seizure and sale; one half the proceeds of such sale shall be paid to the informer and the other half to the United States.

Mr. CLARK. Before that amendment is adopted, I think it should be amended a little further, at the close of line four hundred and seventy-eight on page 145, by inserting the words, "unless the same shall be removed to a bonded warehouse for exportation."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The word "shall," in line four hundred and eighty-seven, after the word "sale," should be "to." I move that amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was to insert after the last amendment the following paragraph:

And that all cigars manufactured after the passage of this act shall be packed in bundles or boxes, open to inspection, and correctly labeled with the number and kind contained therein, and after inspection shall be stamped by the inspector with stamps to be provided by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, deducting the tax paid thereon, and so affixed that the bundle or box cannot be opened without effacing or destroying said stamp. And any bundle, box, or package of cigars which shall be sold or pass out of the hands of the manufacturer, except into a bonded warehouse, without such stamps so affixed by an inspector, shall be forfeited, and may be seized wherever found, and sold, one half to the informer and the other to the United States.

Mr. CLARK. I move to strike out the word "that" after "and," so as to read, "and all cigars manufactured," &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The word "deducting," in line four hundred and ninety-four, should be "denoting." It is a misprint.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOOT.) That modification will be made.

Mr. CLARK. After the word "inspection," in line four hundred and ninety-two, I move to insert "unless the same shall be removed to a bonded warehouse for exportation."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. After the words "one half," in line five hundred, I move to insert "the proceeds of such sale to be paid."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. There should be another amendment in the four hundred and ninetieth line to correspond with the expression in line four hundred and ninety-six. After the word "bundles," in line four hundred and ninety, I move to insert "packages," so as to read, "bundles, packages, or boxes."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to change the word "seven" to "eight" in the four hundred and sixty-fourth line of section ninety-two, on page 145, so as to read, "on cigars known as cheroots or short sixes, made of refuse tobacco, and valued at not over eight dollars per thousand, three dollars per thousand."

Mr. CLARK. I hope that will not be done. After mature consideration by the committee, "seven" was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state what I understand—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin, that inasmuch as the clause which he desires to amend is an amendment that has been already agreed to, it will be necessary to reconsider that vote in order to reach the point.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We can go back to that by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state what I understand, that if a tax of three dollars a thousand is laid on that kind of cigar it will amount to a prohibition almost absolute on the manufacture. If you deduct three dollars for the tax, it will leave but four dollars besides, and as I am informed it will actually cost for the material and the labor of making, $3 50.

Mr. JOHNSON. What do they sell for, is the question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. They must sell for not over seven dollars a thousand, according to this provision, or otherwise the tax would be five dollars, which would be an absolute prohibition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They must be valued at seven dollars a thousand. That is the valuation before the tax.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. "Over seven dollars."

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is right. It is "not over seven dollars."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And the valuation includes the tax.

Several SENATORS. No, no.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is the point in the case. I understand, on inquiry of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, that such is the construction the Department put upon this clause—that the valuation includes the tax.

Mr. JOHNSON. That cannot be.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand that that is the construction which the Department has put upon it, and that is what makes the point material.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is impossible that that can be so.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know that the Department holds so, but I have been so told.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My proposition is to substitute "eight" in place of "seven."

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator that we had better let that go over until we make further inquiry.

Mr. CLARK. I do not think the amendment should be made whether they assess the tax one way or the other. We had before us the gentlemen who are engaged in the manufacture of these short sixes or cheroots, and when they first came before us they represented that they could be made at six dollars a thousand, and after consideration we fixed the value at seven dollars, one dollar higher than they fixed it; but after we fixed it they were very much disturbed that we had not fixed it at eight dollars instead of seven dollars.

I am willing the clause should go out and leave them under the tax for cigars valued at ten dollars per thousand. I think we ought to adhere to the amendment which the committee proposed on mature deliberation. This is only an effort to get a little more margin and a little less tax.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the tax is not a part of the valuation I shall not urge the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Let that be inquired into: It will be open in the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Very well, I will wait until the bill comes into the Senate. It all turns in my mind on the question whether the valuation includes the tax or not.

The next amendment of the committee was in section ninety-five, which is the section mentioning the exemptions from taxation of products and manufacturers, before "plaster" in line eight to insert "bone-dust."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the word "paraffine" in line thirteen of section ninety-five.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert in line eighteen of section ninety-five, "and Swedes, iron rolled expressly for tacks and used for no other purpose."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ninety-eight, line one, after the word "brokers" to insert "and bankers doing business as brokers," and after "sales of" in line three to insert "merchandise, produce;" so as to read:

That all brokers, and bankers doing business as brokers, shall be subject to pay the following duties and rates of duty upon the sales of merchandise, produce, gold and silver bullion, foreign exchange, uncurrent money, promissory notes, stocks, bonds, or other securities as hereinafter mentioned.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert in line twelve of section ninety-eight, "upon all sales of merchandise, produce, or other goods, one eighth of one per cent."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifteen of section ninety-eight, to strike out "fifth," and insert "twentieth;" so that the clause will read:

Upon all sales of stocks, bonds, gold and silver bullion and coin, sterling exchange, promissory notes, or other securities, one twentieth of one per cent, on the amount of such sales, and of all contracts for such sales.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eighteen of section ninety-eight, after "broker" to insert "or banker."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ninety-nine, line two, after the word "on" to strike out "the first Monday of May in each year, to be paid by any person or persons owning, possessing, or keeping any" and to insert "every;" after the word "table" in line four to strike out "plate;" after the word "instruments" in line five to insert "and on all gold and silver plate;" and after "annexed" in line eight to strike out "and marked A" and insert "to be paid by the person or persons owning, possessing, or keeping the same on the first Monday of May in each year;" so as to make the section read:

Sec. 99. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied annually, on every carriage, yacht, billiard table, gold watch, or piano-forte, or other musical instruments, and on all gold and silver plate, the several duties or sums of money set down in figures against the same, respectively, or otherwise specified and set forth in schedule A hereto annexed, to be paid by the person or persons owning, possessing, or keeping the same on the first Monday of May in each year, and the same shall be and remain a lien thereon until paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "anything" in line thirty-nine of schedule A annexed to section ninety-nine to insert "herein."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "sale" in line five of section one hundred, to insert "except when slaughtered for the hides and tallow exclusively;" so as to make the clause read:

On all cattle and calves exceeding three months old, slaughtered for sale, except when slaughtered for the hides and tallow exclusively, forty cents per head.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred, line twelve, to strike out "all" before "cattle;" in line thirteen to strike out "all" before "calves;" after "exceeding" in line thirteen to insert "in all;" to strike out "altogether" in line fourteen; after "consumption" in line fourteen to insert "in any one year;" after "duty" in line sixteen to strike out "and all cattle slaughtered for the hides and tallow shall pay ten cents only per head;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That cattle, not exceeding five in number, and calves, swine, sheep, and lambs, not exceeding in all twenty in number, slaughtered by any person for his or her own consumption, in any one year, shall be exempt from duty; and all sheep slaughtered for the pelts shall pay two cents only per head.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line four of section one hundred and one, to strike out the words "whose business or occupation it is to slaughter for sale," and to insert "who shall buy and slaughter for sale, or who shall be the occupant of any building or premises in which such cattle, sheep, or swine shall be slaughtered;" and to strike out "general" before "provisions" in line twenty-five.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and two, to strike out in line four the words "upon which steam is used as a propelling power" and to insert "propelled by steam or any other power;" and after "power" in line six to strike out "shall be subject to and pay a duty of two and a half per cent. on the gross amount of all the receipts of such railroad or railroads or steam vessel for the transportation of the United States mails, freight, express freight, and passengers over and upon the same; and any person or persons, firms, companies, or corporations, owning or possessing, or having the care or management of any railroad or railroads using any other power than steam thereon, or owning, possessing, or having the care and management," and to insert "or of," so as to make the clause read:

That any person, firm, company, or corporation, owning or possessing, or having the care or management of any railroad or railroads propelled by steam or other power, or of any steamboat or other vessel propelled by steam power, or of any ferry-boat or vessel used as a ferry-boat, propelled by steam or horse power, shall be subject to and pay a duty of two and a half per cent. upon the gross receipts, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it intended to lay a tax upon the city railroads?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was done before. We have simply changed the phraseology. The tax is laid upon horse railroads as well as upon steam railroads.

Mr. JOHNSON. What do you mean by "before?" The antecedent law?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; by this bill, before the amendment. We have inserted "propelled by steam or other power" in line four, and down below in the thirteenth line we have struck out "any railroad or railroads using any other power than steam thereon." We merely change the phraseology, putting it in better shape than it was before, as we thought.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after "railroad," in line eighteen of section one hundred and two, to insert "steamboat;" so as to read, "gross receipts of such railroad, steamboat, or ferry-boat," &c.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is a line, perhaps more than one, I know there is one line of steamboats that runs between Baltimore and Philadelphia, and I think a separate one goes between Baltimore and New York. They go not outside, but through the Chesapeake and Delaware canal and through the Delaware and Raritan canal; and they pay tolls to each of the canals through which they pass. This tax, as I understand it, is a tax on the gross receipts of such steamboats. I believe by the bill you tax the canal companies on their receipts. Then you tax the steamboat owners on what they pay out, provided you make the tax on their gross receipts. For example, a steamer running from Baltimore to Philadelphia will receive, say $100 gross, but of that $100 gross it has to pay fifty dollars to the canal company. Now, I submit to the honorable chairman of the committee and to the Senate whether in such a case it is not right to make a provision that they shall be credited with the amount which they pay in the way of tolls. They get from a customer whose goods they carry to Philadelphia, say $100; they charge him $100; but of that $100 they pay fifty dollars to the canal company.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say to the Senator that if there is a case which he thinks ought to form an exception, it can be done by way of amendment afterwards. We are now acting simply upon the amendments of the committee. He can look at the section and see if it is necessary to amend it. The general principle adopted is to tax gross receipts.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know; but I made the suggestion now because the committee recommend as an amendment the insertion of the word "steamboat" in the section. It was not in the section before.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is in order to carry out the previous amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Steamboats perhaps would not have been in but for this amendment; but a tax of two and a half per cent. on the gross receipts will be found perhaps to leave them nothing. What I thought might be done was to provide that in settling the accounts they should be entitled to be credited with the amount paid for tolls.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will notice in the fifth line of the original section without our amendment, were the words "or of any steamboat or other vessel propelled by steam power;" we have merely changed the phraseology to carry out the idea.

Mr. JOHNSON. I can offer my proposition afterwards.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-six of section one hundred and two, to strike out "five" and insert "three;" so as to make the clause read:

And any person or persons, firms, companies, or corporations, owning, possessing, or having the care or management of any toll road or bridge authorized by law to receive toll for the transit of passengers, beasts, carriages, teams, and freight, of any description, over such toll road or bridge, shall be subject to and pay a duty of three per cent. on the gross amount of all their receipts of every description.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why do you not tax canals?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The difficulty is that most of the important canals are owned by the States, and we did not see how we could reach them.

Mr. HARRIS. The Delaware and Hudson canal is owned by a corporation.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Chesapeake and Delaware is owned by a private company.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We should single out some canals and not tax others. We would not be allowed to tax the Erie canal of New York, which is owned by that State.

Mr. JOHNSON. We might except those belonging to the States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why should those belonging to the States be exempt, and those belonging to private companies be taxed? I hope my friend from New York will look at the matter and draw a provision to reach the case if he can.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not see any reason why canals owned by States should not pay a tax too. We tax railroads, and they add the tax to those whose freight and merchandise they carry. It is but that much discrimination in favor of the canals unless we tax them too. I think we had better tax the canals.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will only say that I am very anxious to get at it if we can in any way; and if my friend from New York or my friend from Maryland, who understands this matter, will frame a clause to meet the case, I shall be very much obliged to him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section one hundred and two the following words:

*But when the gross receipts of any such bridge or toll road shall not exceed the amount necessarily expended to keep such bridge or road in repair, no tax shall be imposed on such receipts: *Provided, That all such persons, companies, and corporations shall have the right to add the duty or tax imposed hereby to their rates of fare whenever their liability thereon may commence, any limitations which may exist by law or by agreement with any person or company which may have paid or be liable to pay such fare to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the proviso. In the first place, if the laws of the State do not regulate the matter of toll, then without any such provision it is competent for the companies to add the tax to their charges, and no law of Congress is needed to enable them to do that. But I submit that if the State has regulated the question of toll Congress cannot interfere with it. These companies are created by State law; they are authorized to erect railroads, to construct turnpikes, and to build bridges. All the powers that they possess as corporations are given to them by State law, and that State law has fixed the charges that they may make upon the people. Now, is it within the power of Congress to interfere so as to enable them to charge that which the State law creating them has forbidden them to charge? If Congress cannot do that it is unnecessary to do anything which this proviso attempts. It seems to me it ought to be stricken out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The answer to that is very obvious. There are some cases where the rate of fare is fixed by the laws creating the corporation and they cannot charge any more. Now, if we put so heavy a burden as this on them, it seems very hard that they should not have the power if they please to bring up their rates so as to cover the tax. These companies, where the charge is not fixed by law, can, if they choose, add the tax. Those whose charges are fixed by State law cannot. That would operate very unequally, and, as we think, very unjustly. Under these circumstances we thought it best to insert a provision allowing them to add the tax to their charges.

The question which the Senator from Indiana makes in regard to this amendment was also considered by the committee; but inasmuch as these companies were very desirous that they should have the power of trying the question, we thought it no more than right to make the provision and allow them to do it. The Senator will see that in fact it operates only upon very few companies, because, as I before stated, where these limitations do not exist they will add the tax to their charges, if they please, according to their own will. My own impression is, that inasmuch as Congress creates the burden, Congress can, if it pleases, say how that burden shall be assessed, and give this power; but that is a question which might be made a question for the courts, if the State chose to do it. Undoubtedly it would be a question between the corporations and the States creating them. When the States affixed these limitations they affixed them probably without reference to any action of Congress increasing the burdens of the companies and taxing them heavily for the benefit of the national Treasury. Could they have foreseen that anything of this sort would take place they undoubtedly would either not have affixed the limitation or they would have provided for it. It is an emergency unforeseen; and it is not probable that a State will object in the slightest degree to it, or institute proceedings to forfeit the charter of any company for simply making the addition, an addition in the same proportion that companies not thus limited make. We came to the conclusion, and I think we came to it unanimously in the committee, that it was not only wise but fair and just that this provision should be inserted for the benefit of companies laboring under those disabilities.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is a question of power.

The question being taken upon the amendment to the amendment, there were, on a division—ayes 12, noes 17.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I voted to strike out the proviso under the impression that Congress has no authority to make any such provision—

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me I will state my view of it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are many gas companies that were organized under special acts or general laws, where the amount they can charge for gas is fixed by the State law. If we require the gas companies to pay this tax, in the present condition of the coal market and the depreciation of money, it will break them up. Is there any difficulty in Congress saying who shall pay this tax?

We are levying taxes on the citizens through the corporations. We make these corporations merely agents of ours to collect the tax from individuals. It is not a tax assessed upon the gas company so much as upon the consumption of gas; it is a tax assessed on the consumer, and we allow the gas company to collect from the consumer of the gas the tax that we choose to impose.

I think there is no legal or constitutional difficulty in the way. We simply make these corporations created by the States agents of the General Government to collect from their customers the tax that we put upon the article. We may say who shall pay this tax, whether it shall be paid directly by the corporation or paid directly by the consumer. We can if we choose change the terms of this law and say that each consumer of gas shall pay so much per thousand feet; or we may say that the gas company shall pay it and may collect it from the customer, and in that way it is a direct tax upon the consumer, although the money is paid into the national Treasury by the corporation. I take the case of gas merely as an illustration.

There are many cases where our tax laws from the peculiar circumstances of the time are very oppressive on corporations. The railroad laws of the States in some cases fix the price to be charged for the transportation of passengers and freight. In some cases, owing to the increase of business, the railroad companies make a great deal of money, but in other cases the tax operates very severely on them, because they have to pay higher prices for all they use and consume while their receipts are not proportionately increased. If we put all this tax on the corporations and do not allow them to collect it back again from their consumers or the persons who employ them, it will be very oppressive on them. Therefore, as in this case the State law fixes the limit of price and we impose a burden upon the corporation, or rather upon the consumer of the article, upon the person who rides in the railroad car or the consumer of gas, we make the corporation the medium to collect it. We have a right to say who shall eventually pay the tax. I see no difficulty in it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question before he proceeds. Could anybody object to this in its operation except the State that chartered the corporation?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The individual could.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How? In what way could he try it?

Mr. TRUMBULL. He may refuse to pay.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They say "We demand so much from you for carrying you over our railroad."

Mr. JOHNSON. He replies, "Under what authority? Your charter does not give it." Then they say, "We do it under the act of Congress." That brings up the question directly, have you any power by act of Congress to authorize it? If you have the power to pass this act of Congress the question could not arise even as between the State and the corporation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The individual might bring an action against the company for refusing to carry him over the road.

Mr. JOHNSON. He might refuse to pay.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then they would not carry him.

Mr. JOHNSON. But that brings up the question of power.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The argument of the Senator from Ohio seems to me to be rather ingenious than sound. He thinks it right that we shall tax these companies or corporations, or that we shall derive a tax from this kind of business, and then says that it will be very unjust if a corporation is made to pay the tax and is not allowed to impose an additional charge upon the persons for whom it does business or renders service. That may be so; and in the end he says this is to be paid at any rate by the consumers, and therefore you have a right to collect it directly from the company or corporation.

I think these positions are not sound. In the first place, you have no authority and no power to make these corporations your agents to do this business. You may pass a law authorizing State officers to perform certain duties under acts of Congress; but it has been decided that you cannot compel them to do them. It is optional with them whether they will do so or not. In order to enforce your own laws you must have your own instruments. Therefore you cannot, as the Senator from Ohio supposes, make these companies and corporations your agents to collect this tax from the consumers. You have no power to do that. They are not your officers. Although they may voluntarily assume to perform the duty for you, you cannot impose it upon them.

Again, I know of no authority that you have to change this contract. This proviso declares that notwithstanding any contract or agreement which has been entered into to perform a particular service for a given sum, you will authorize one of the parties to that agreement to charge an additional sum. I agree, to take the case put by the Senator from Ohio, that you may levy a tax upon the consumers of the gas; you may get at it in that way; but it does strike me—my attention has only been called to it now—that such a provision as is contained in this amendment is manifestly unconstitutional. The manner in which you do it is a violation of the contract of the parties, and you cannot change the charters granted by States. If a State has authorized a company to carry on a particular business and to charge a certain price the Congress of the United States has no power to authorize that company to charge a higher price. You cannot vary the charter of a State Legislature. It is the mode you have provided in this amendment to get at it which I insist is unconstitutional. While I agree to all the Senator from Ohio says about the injustice of the case, I think we must assess this tax in some different way than imposing it on the corporation, and in some different way from saying that those rates which have been agreed upon by the parties shall be changed by this law and that any agreement to the contrary shall not be binding. It strikes me that Congress has no such power, and I shall therefore vote to strike out this proviso.

Mr. FESSENDEN. One company which applied to us and argued the question with very great force was the gas company of the city of Chicago. It represented that if we imposed the tax on gas companies upon that company, limited and controlled as it was by its charter from the Legislature of the State of Illinois, it must inevitably leave the city of Chicago in darkness. The same remark applied to the gas company of the city of Philadelphia. They were limited in their rates; they could charge but a certain sum; and with the amount they have to pay for coal and their greatly increased expenditures, if they are not at liberty to raise their rates when we put this very heavy tax on them, the result will be that they cannot get along. We were satisfied that that was so, and we were satisfied that it was so in regard to some railroads, which are limited in the same way.

It is a very simple process for a Senator to say "You must get at it in some other way." Why does not the Senator exercise his ingenuity, and tell us what other mode there is than to assess this tax directly on the companies? There is no other mode in which we can do it that we know of. We must therefore either give up the tax, give up the revenue to be derived from the gas tax, which is very large, and from all the railroads, which is also very large, or else we must include all in the same category; and when we include them as we are compelled to do in order to carry out the principle, we include some few important gas companies and some few important railroads that in another time and in another state of things were subjected by their charters to particular limitations. We see that we have no choice. We must either subject them to this great hardship or we must give up our tax; or else we must provide what they wish us to provide, give them the power to assess this tax upon those who are their customers. We cannot afford to give up the revenue. We think it is very hard to attempt to make companies thus situated pay the tax themselves and ruin them perhaps; I do not know how far it would go toward that. The only thing that is left, if we do not wish to give up the tax, is simply to make this provision.

The Senator from Illinois thinks we have no power to make this provision. On that point opinions may differ. Although that is his opinion, there are others, and the Senator from Ohio is one of them, and I am another, who do not consider that there is a want of power to make this provision. Under the circumstances, what is the difficulty, considering the inherent trouble of the case, in leaving that question to be settled by the courts, if anybody chooses to raise it? There are but two classes of persons who can raise it. You may find a litigant who, for the sake of settling the principle, will expend some hundreds of dollars rather than pay half a dollar. I do not think it is exactly a case for a new John Hampden to defend his interest. The only other party is the State itself that chartered the company, and I do not think that, under the circumstances, the State would feel that its dignity required that it should enforce it.

In this state of things the committee, as I before said, came unanimously to the conclusion that it was but fair and right, and the only mode by which we could possibly reach it, to put in a provision of this kind and leave the question to be settled by the courts if anybody chooses to raise it. The committee thought that, inasmuch as we imposed the tax, we had the power to authorize it to be put in this way upon those who have to pay it ultimately, and who ought to pay it ultimately. I trust the provision will be retained.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to add but a word or two to what I feel it to be my duty to say to the Senate. I ask the attention of Senators to the language of this proviso:

Provided, That all such persons, companies, and corporations shall have the right to add the duty or tax imposed hereby to their rates of fare whenever their liability thereto may commence, any limitations which may exist by law or by agreement with any person or company which may have paid or be liable to pay such fare to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Any limitation which may exist by law to the contrary." By a law of a State; by the law of a State which says that the charges shall not exceed a certain amount. Can we in respect to any of these corporations change the charter? Can we say that they may charge that which the State law has prohibited them to charge? I was struck with the argument of the chairman of the Finance Committee on this point. He is usually very clear in all the propositions which he states to the Senate; and yet after informing the Senate that this subject was very carefully considered by his committee he would not give it as his opinion clearly and plainly to the Senate that this was within the power of Congress. He says that this question may be referred to the courts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I stated that although the question was not free from doubt, the honorable Senator from Ohio had given his opinion that we had the power, and that I entertained the same opinion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not understand the Senator to express himself so positively as he now does; but his suggestion that we may act upon this question and refer it to the courts is rather a new one, I think, in the Senate of the United States. If Senators do not believe that we have the power, shall we say that we will attempt to exercise it, and let the courts pronounce against our usurpation of power? We have to decide this for ourselves under the same obligations of an oath that the judges of the courts have upon them. If we doubt, that doubt must carry us against the exercise of the power. If we doubt whether the Constitution allows us to do this, I think we cannot do it.

Two of the Senators have referred to the case of gas companies. I do not know what is the condition of particular companies; but I understand that there is no stock in the country so valuable, that brings so large a return to the holder, as gas stock. It may not be so in Chicago; I do not know how that is; but I understand that generally in the cities it is the very best stock a man can buy; and there are not many gas companies upon whom this tax will be a hard one. But is the hardship of a particular case, the case of the company in Chicago, to control? "Hard cases make a shipwreck of law." Are they to be the shipwreck of the Constitution too? My notion about it is that this tax ought to be upon the net receipts of the employments, of the roads, of the business of the companies; that we ought not to tax their gross incomes but their net receipts. Then we do tax an income as we tax the income of each citizen; and I think that the tax on a corporation ought to be in that respect precisely as it is imposed upon the citizen. If you make it a tax on the net receipts or income, there is no more hardship on the corporation than on any individual in the country. All the citizens pay on their income. Let corporations do that; and from the gross income are to be deducted the expenditures in the particular business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We pay on our gross income.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not exactly that. An attorney pays on the proceeds of his profession, but not upon all the proceeds, because the construction of the law is that we may deduct from the income the expenses connected with our profession, our office rent and the like of that. So a tax on the income of a railroad corporation ought to be upon the net income after deducting its expenditures. The committee, however, have not seen fit to adopt that principle of legislation in respect to these corporations. Still I do not think we ought to disregard the constitutional difficulty which lies in the way of the adoption of the proposition of the committee in this instance. If the cases alluded to by Senators are hard cases, they ought to be remedied by the proper tribunal, the Legislatures of the States. If the Legislatures are disposed to aid Congress in the collection of a revenue, let them give the proper relief; I do not think Congress can; I have therefore proposed my motion. I wish to add that I am glad the Senator from Illinois has called for the yeas and nays, because this is an important question, and our decision will be a precedent upon other questions of a similar sort.

Mr. CLARK. I understood the Senator from Indiana to call this a new question. It is not a new question. The same question was before the Senate two years ago when we passed the tax bill. The same provision was inserted in that law, and it was after mature deliberation then that the Senate adopted it. It was not precisely in the same words as this or in the same connection, but the same principle is in the law. I recollect it very well. The same question was raised and the same discussion had. For two years the provision has worked and never has produced any collision between the States, and the Government of the United States, or between any individual and the United States. I suggest to the Senate that we had better now retain it, the practice having commenced under it. Let the States change their charters if necessary, as they undoubtedly will, because it will be a great hardship in many cases to compel these corporations to pay the tax and give them no redress over.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have said upon an analogous question that I thought there was no authority to pass a provision of this kind. I do not propose to argue the question again as a question of law. The object of the committee is to raise money, and that of itself in the abstract is quite a laudable object; but they are attempting to do it, I think, by this mode of taxation, to a greater extent than is just in itself, and they try to avoid that injustice in the practical result of what they are doing, by seeking to do what, as I think, they have no power to do, lay your tax on the gross proceeds of these companies instead of the net proceeds. Because a tax on the gross proceeds is very onerous to these companies, you propose to authorize them to throw that burden from their own shoulders on the persons with whom they deal. My idea, and that is the idea expressed by the Senator from Indiana, is that if the charters of these several companies limit the charge which they are authorized to make for doing the business which they are authorized by their charters to carry on, we have no power to give them the right to go beyond that charge; and yet that is precisely what is proposed to be done by this proviso. There is no necessity for it except the necessity which grows out of your mode of imposing the tax. If you will impose the tax on the net proceeds there will be no necessity for it.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland whether the Government, if it disturbs the relations which exist between vendor and vendee, in the legitimate exercise of its functions, has not a right to relieve in equity against the operation of its law. For instance, if A contracts to deliver whisky at fifty cents a gallon to B on a given day, three months from this time, and in the meanwhile whisky is taxed a dollar or a dollar and a half a gallon, it becomes utterly impossible for A, owing to the legitimate exercise of the Government power, to deliver; has it not the power to say to the vendee, B, that if he insists upon the specific performance of the contract he must pay the tax?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is another question altogether.

Mr. COWAN. That is this question precisely; and it is the same principle which underlies all these questions. What is the charter of a corporate company? Nothing but a contract between it and the State which gives the charter. This Government has the power to tax; and if by levying a tax it makes it impossible for the company to discharge its duties under the charter that it holds from the State, we can relieve as against that just in the same way as we can say to the vendor, "If the vendee does not pay the tax you are discharged from the obligation of the contract." So it is with the charter of these gas companies: if the people do not desire to pay what the charter allows the company to charge and the additional tax, and the company cannot get along otherwise, they need not have gas-light; that is all.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not admit the law to be as stated by the honorable member from Pennsylvania. I understand him to say that if A contracts with B to sell goods to B for a specific price, and the taxing power of the State or the taxing power of the United States imposes a tax on that sale, the same power has a right to authorize the vendor to charge that amount to his vendee. That I deny. Whether the vendor could go into a court of equity and ask upon that ground to be relieved from the obligation to perform his contract is another question. I do not believe he could; but, if I recollect, the question propounded by way of illustration by the honorable member from Pennsylvania was passed upon by the Senate on a former occasion at this session. I think the honorable member from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] proposed to authorize the vendor in certain cases to charge the amount of the increased duty which we imposed to his vendee, and it was voted down.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The honorable Senator will recollect that it was voted down because the majority of the Senate wanted to pass that bill without any amendment, so as to prevent its going back to the House of Representatives, and therefore they would listen to no proposition. That was the ground; that was the reason given for it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know what ground influenced the action of the majority of the Senate; but I know that I took objection to the amendment proposed by the member from Wisconsin precisely on the ground that the object contemplated by that amendment, as by this, is what we have no power to do. I do not propose to argue it further.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I have no recollection of this question at the time of the passage of the former act, as referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire. All the opinion I have about it is formed at this time; and I will express in a few words what that opinion is.

This provision applies to railroad companies, ferry companies, and other associations that exercise franchises. A railroad company has two classes of interests in the railroad. It owns the bed of the road, which is real estate; and whether the sill and the rail itself is a part of the realty or personalty I shall not undertake to define. But the chief property of a railroad company or of a ferry company is the franchise which it receives from the State that incorporates the company. One question involved in this provision is, has Congress a right to tax a franchise granted to a corporation by a State? I say it has not. Another question would arise, whether Congress has the power to impose a tax upon the real estate of the railroad company or of the ferry company. I will concede that it has. Congress has a power to impose a tax upon all real and personal estate. Consequently, upon the property of any railroad or ferry company or of any gas-light company, so far as that property is real estate, Congress has the right to impose a tax on the value of that real estate. The other and additional question is, whether it has the right to impose a tax on the franchise granted to the corporation by the State. I say it has not. I accept the position of the Senator from Illinois that Congress has no right to substitute a corporation created by a State, to make it the collector or instrument by which this tax is to be collected. If it imposes a tax and wants a tax-gatherer, it must constitute that tax-gatherer by its own law, and it cannot adopt the agency of agents of a State to do that office unless at the option and by the voluntary consent of the State agency.

But I say that I am entirely opposed to the manner in which this thing is proposed to be done; and I am opposed to the substance of the thing itself. My position is that the franchise, either directly or indirectly, in the earnings of the franchise which is granted by a Legislature of a State in an act of incorporation is not a subject for congressional taxation. Why, sir, what would be the operation? The State may originally grant or withhold the franchise. It grants the franchise upon a condition and for a consideration; and what is that condition and that consideration? It is that the corporators shall execute the franchise at a certain rate of charge. This rate of charge is not for the benefit of the State as a political corporation; it is for the benefit of the people; it is for the benefit of the mass of the people who use the corporation, who travel on the railroad, who cross the ferry, who purchase the gas where a gas company is incorporated with power to impose a certain rate of charge, and to collect that by law. That is the essence of the franchise; that is the privilege granted by the State Legislature. The question is whether this privilege granted by a State Legislature to a portion of its people, this franchise, is properly the subject of taxation by the General Government or not. I maintain that it is not; because if the General Government may tax the corporation or the franchise it may tax it indefinitely; it may tax it to such an amount as to be oppressive, so that the State would never have granted the franchise to the corporators if it had anticipated that that rate of charge by the railroad or by the ferry company would be imposed upon its people.

Here, sir, is a contract between the State and the corporators by which the State sells a franchise to the corporators. It is a matter over which the General Government has no jurisdiction or control. It is a matter purely of State legislation and of State polity between it, acting for its people generally, and the corporators. It chooses to sell one of its franchises to a railroad company to construct a line of railroad, and authorizes it to adopt a scale of charges for the transportation of passengers and of merchandise limited by a certain rate. It is a franchise, in another form, granted by the State to a ferry corporation, by which it vests in the corporators the right to build boats for the purpose of ferrying individuals across a stream, and it authorizes the ferry company to impose a rate of taxation and to collect it summarily. These features constitute the franchise. It is originally in the pleasure of the State to grant or to withhold the franchise. No State grants a franchise upon an illimitable power on the part of the corporators to levy what tolls they please or what charges they please for the rates of travel and transportation. It is always done upon contract, and upon a limit upon the amount of such charges that the corporators may impose.

The question is whether those rates may be augmented by Congress imposing a tax upon the corporation and empowering the corporators to collect the tax in the form of additional rates of travel and transportation from those who travel or do business upon their road or ferry. That is the whole question. I say that that would be an interference on the part of Congress with a contract. A grant of a franchise by a State to corporators is a contract in the literal and rigid sense of the term. It is a contract whose sanctity is protected by the constitutions of the States and of the United States respectively. Neither party to a contract granting a franchise upon the conditions that I have referred to can change that contract of himself. If any change is made it must be made by the mutual consent of the parties to the contract; and Congress has no right to intervene in the matter, and to levy a tax upon the franchise and authorize the corporators to impose the amount of that tax as an additional charge on the customers who use their road or ferry. While I assume that ground, I concede that on any visible property that any corporation may own, any real estate at its fair value assessed like other real estate in the country, Congress may impose a tax. Beyond that amount or in any other form I deny that Congress has the power to impose a tax.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Pomeroy, Powell, Ten Eyck, and Trumbull—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Chandler, Collamer, Harding, Henderson, Hicks, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Wilkinson, and Wright—16.

So the amendment of Mr. HENDRICKS to the amendment of the Committee on Finance was rejected.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Finance Committee was in section one hundred and five, line three, to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to read:

That for every passport issued from the office of the Secretary of State there shall be paid the sum of five dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and seven, line six, after the word "horsemanship" to strike out "or;" after "acrobatic sports" to insert "or other shows;" after "concerts," in line eight, to strike out "exhibitions;" and in line thirteen, after "exhibitions" to insert "shows."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and eight, line four, after the word "or" to insert "of any toll-road or;" and after "carrying," in line five, to insert "on."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seventeen of section one hundred and eight, after the word "also" to strike out "within ten days;" and in line eighteen strike out "Commissioner of Internal Revenue" and insert "collector."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. In regard to the next section I have an amendment intended as a substitute for that and the various amendments reported by the committee to it. I propose that my amendment be printed, and that that section be passed over.

Mr. SUMNER. What section is that?

Mr. SHERMAN. Section one hundred and nine, covering banks and banking. My amendment is rather too long to understand it by the mere reading of it. I want it printed, and the section to be passed over informally.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection.

The amendment was ordered to be printed, and section one hundred and nine was passed over.

Mr. CONNESS also submitted an amendment, which was received informally and ordered to be printed.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and ten, line three, after the word "lotteries" to strike out "as aforesaid;" and in line four to strike out "five" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

That every individual, partnership, firm, and association, being proprietors, managers, or agents of lotteries, shall pay a tax of ten per cent. on the gross amount of the receipts from the said business.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-five, after the word "dollars" to insert "or be imprisoned not exceeding one year."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the second "from," in line thirty-nine of section one hundred and ten, before "tax."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and thirteen, line twenty-seven, after the word "district" to strike out "as aforesaid;"

and in line thirty, after the word "return" to strike out "as aforesaid."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifty-five of section one hundred and thirteen, after "law" to, strike out "as aforesaid;" and in line fifty-six to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$600," so as to read, "and that the receipts for advertisements to the amount of $600 annually," &c., "shall be exempt from duty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "duty," in line sixty of section thirteen, to strike out the following proviso:

And provided further, That all newspapers whose circulation does not exceed two thousand copies shall be exempted from all taxes for advertisements.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "two" and inserting "one;" so as to read, "all newspapers whose circulation does not exceed one thousand copies shall be exempted from all taxes for advertisements."

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. If the exemption is made at all, let it be made up to two thousand, because that is a very small circulation for a newspaper. One thousand would be simply no circulation at all.

Mr. HALE. If there be any papers that have but one thousand, and that is no circulation at all, there would be the more necessity for making the exemption in their case. I can tell the Senator that there are a great many newspapers which do not circulate a thousand copies, little country papers.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire to make his amendment fifteen hundred instead of one thousand.

Mr. HALE. Very good. Try fifteen hundred.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That will cover most of the country newspapers.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know what is meant by "circulation." Does it mean regular daily or weekly subscribers? If I am correctly informed, there are some of the most profitable publications in the country that have not comparatively any regular subscribers, but they are advertising sheets that circulate some weeks very extensively and other weeks comparatively none; they are advertising papers published in the large cities, and they have no legitimate circulation in the sense in which we understand that term. They do not have any subscription books with two or three thousand names down; but they sell an immense number through the cars by boys, and to the merchants to distribute for western and southern trade. Shall not that class of publications be taxed? It seems to me they should. I should like to understand exactly what we are voting for when we are striking this out.

Mr. BUCKALEW. By the word "circulation" is meant all copies distributed. That is the general sense.

Mr. GRIMES. Regular distribution or irregular distribution?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Either.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Insert the word "distribution."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, to amend the clause by striking out "two thousand" and inserting "fifteen hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the committee, to strike out the clause as amended.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and fourteen, line three, after "any" to insert "person or;" after "any," in the same line, insert "person;" after "incorporated," in line four, to insert "or unincorporated;" and after "company," in line four, to insert "having more than one place of business;" so that the clause will read:

That whenever by this act any license, duty, or tax of any description has been imposed on any person or corporate body, or property of any person, incorporated or unincorporated company having more than one place of business, it shall be lawful for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to prescribe and determine in what district such tax shall be assessed and collected, and to what officer thereof the official notices required in that behalf shall be given, and of whom payment of such tax shall be demanded.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the section the following proviso:

Provided, That all manufacturing corporations shall be assessed, and the tax collected in the district within which the place of manufacture is located.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 26, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. HOSMER, of Buffalo, New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RELIEF OF CITIZENS OF DENVER.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table bill of the House No 432, for the relief of citizens of Denver, in the Territory of Colorado, in order that the amendments of the Senate may be concurred in. I will state that the amendments are merely verbal.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken up, and the amendments of the Senate were read and concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from the Oswego district, [Mr. LITTLEJOHN,] who has been detained from the House by ill health nearly the whole session, a few days ago introduced a bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, in relation to the repair of the harbors on the lakes. The Committee on Commerce is entirely opposed in the present state of the finances of the country to reporting any general river and harbor bill; but they directed me to report back the bill which was introduced by the gentleman from New York, with amendments. The first section of that bill provided an appropriation of $300,000 for the purpose of repairing such public works upon the lakes as require to be repaired in order that they may not be entirely destroyed. Another section provided that the same sum should be appropriated for the preservation of the harbors on the sea-coast. The Committee on Commerce have directed me to report that bill back, reducing the amount in the first section to $250,000; and in the second section—and it is done in accordance with the views of the gentlemen on the committee who represent the seaboard—we reduce the appropriation from $300,000 to $100,000. That, according to them, is enough for the repairs needed to preserve the harbors on the seaboard, so far as the public works are concerned. These appropriations are to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and of the engineer of the War Department, who has full knowledge of the repairs necessary to prevent the public works upon the great lakes and the seaboard from going to decay.

This bill, as every gentleman knows, must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, if objection be made. I have made this statement to the House, and if any objection be made to considering it now I ask that it may be printed, and its consideration postponed to another day.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that instead of having the bill printed and postponed indefinitely, the bill be postponed to a day certain, when we may go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and take it up and consider it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am willing to conform to what seems to be the wish of the House, but I will state to my friend from Wisconsin that I am as much interested in this bill as he is, and I think that there will be no objection to it, and that what I propose is all that we can accomplish at the present time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois. Was the original bill based upon estimates from the War Department?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It was drawn up by the gentleman from New York, after consultation with the engineers of the War Department. They, of course, could not give any very accurate estimates. They thought that $300,000 for the lakes was as little as could be got along with. The committee reduced that $50,000. I would have been glad to have cut it down more, but I think the wants of commerce require that we should make this appropriation, and make it speedily, to prevent our harbors going to destruction.

Mr. HOLMAN. I want to know whether the War Department has made any recommendation on the subject at all. It is not embraced in the estimates.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It has not made any specific recommendation, and we did not call for any. The knowledge of the members of the Committee on Commerce and of the House was sufficient to justify us in reporting the bill to the House.

Mr. GANSON. The gentleman will find that the report of the Secretary of War contains an express recommendation for an appropriation for the preservation of these harbors.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This bill was not referred to the Secretary of War. I know he has made a general recommendation.

Mr. GANSON. Special reference was made to the harbor of Buffalo. A breach was made in the wall last January, and something must be done at once to save that harbor.

Mr. STEVENS. Have we not appropriated for it?

Mr. GANSON. It was struck out by the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object to the bill being referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not object to the reporting of it if it goes to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That I could introduce the bill and refer it to the Committee of the Whole I knew very well; but I did not suppose that to a bill of this kind, so intimately connected with the great interests of commerce, there would be any objection.

Mr. COX. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the appropriations in this bill are in gross or in detail for the various harbors.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. For the various harbors upon the lakes which are mentioned. The lakes are mentioned.

Mr. COX. So much for each harbor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the bill may be reported and postponed.

Mr. STEVENS. I object, unless it is sent to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill is not before the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania objects?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not object if it be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I shall ask the House on Monday next to suspend the rules to allow me to report it.

IDAHO TERRITORY.

Mr. WALLACE, of Idaho. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho."

Mr. COX. I object to its being reported to be acted upon now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the object is to refer it to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. WALLACE, of Idaho. There is necessity for immediate action, and I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his objection until I can make a statement showing that necessity.

Mr. COX. I do not see any necessity for immediate action upon a bill of this kind.

Mr. WALLACE, of Idaho. I can show it, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. COX. These bills are always referred to the Committee on Territories. I have no objection if it be so referred.

Mr. WALLACE, of Idaho, thereupon, by unanimous consent, reported the bill, which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

PAYMENT OF PERUVIAN CLAIMS.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill, which has been long neglected, to pay the Peruvian award. The Peruvian agent is now here, and is anxious, on account of the troubles in his country, to go home. The bill was reported some time since.

The SPEAKER. The bill is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 65) to pay certain claims of Peruvian citizens, and that the same be considered in the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The bill I desired to report is of quite as much importance as the payment of Peruvian citizens. I object.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

The House proceeded, as the regular order of business, to the consideration of a joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) authorizing the President to give the requisite notice for terminating the treaty made with Great Britain on behalf of the British provinces in North America, and to appoint commissioners to negotiate a new treaty with the British Government based upon the true principles of reciprocity; upon which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] was entitled to the floor for one hour and a half, with leave of the House to parcel out that time to such persons as he should designate.

Mr. WARD stated that he would yield fifteen minutes of his time to Mr. BAXTER, and ten minutes each to Messrs. J. C. ALLEN, SWEAT, DAVIS of Maryland, LITTLEJOHN, and MORRILL.

Mr. BAXTER. By the courtesy of the gentleman from New York I am permitted to submit a few remarks upon this subject, not to occupy beyond fifteen minutes. Of course the remarks cannot be very well considered, or put into the shape of a speech. That I am not able to do, but I will refer to one or two matters connected with this subject. The question before this House as now presented is whether a notice to terminate this treaty, called the reciprocity treaty, shall be given pure and simple, or whether it shall be diluted to a milk-and-water consistency. This reciprocity treaty, so called, is a misnomer entirely. After the people of Great Britain became dissatisfied with taxing themselves for the benefit of the colonies, and after the corn laws were repealed, it became necessary that that Government should be supplied with breadstuffs from some other quarter. Immediately the question was agitated in Canada, and men were sent here to make profers to our Government, pretending that they had something to give for what they asked in return. General Taylor's Cabinet, with Mr. Preston, of Virginia, in it, gave it no heed whatever, beyond a proper examination, declaring that they had no constitutional right to make such a treaty or compact; and, in the next place, to do it would be impolitic and destructive of American interests and American policy. The next move made in Canada was to send some of the ablest and most distinguished men under that Government here, to press upon this Government the absolute necessity of carrying that measure through.

Immediately—whether honestly or dishonestly does not become me to say—the question was raised by the party, the head of which is now the head of the Canadian Government, of Canadian annexation. Annexation was their cry; they could not live without being annexed to this country. They came here with that cry. On one side they said, "You give us this reciprocity treaty, give us a closer commercial connection with you, and our people will become so completely fascinated with your institutions that the fruit will soon become ripe and will drop into your lap." On the other side to the men of the South, "Give us what we want; let us have your rich markets for our products without taxation, and our people will have no desire for annexation;" and those men of the South, always skillful legislators, understood and were willing to concede to them the treaty, notwithstanding the influence of Colonel Preston to the contrary, when he was in the Cabinet of General Taylor.

Ay, Mr. Speaker, but that is not all. They undertook to intimidate our oily whalebone friends—always a little slippery. They said to them, "If you do not let us into your rich markets not a mother's son of you shall ever catch another cod or another mackerel in the waters of Newfoundland." They were a little frightened by that, and began to think they were "gone, hook and line;" but then these Canadians said again, "If you do not give this treaty we will break these nurseries of your seamen, and then how will you cope on the water with Great Britain, so long claiming to be mistress of the seas?" They then said to the great West, to Chicago, "Give us this treaty and you can have direct communication with Europe, and you can become direct importers; and when a vessel is hailed on the ocean, 'Where are you bound?' the answer will be, 'Chicago.'" [Laughter.] Well, sir, the treaty was granted, and how many vessels on the ocean were ever hailed "Where are you bound?" that answered "Chicago?" The tracks have been very few and all in one direction.

There is another question, Mr. Speaker, of vital importance, which should be considered in this connection; it is the question of immigration. We are at this moment losing brave men at the rate of a thousand every day, and how are we to make up the loss except from the men of Europe? Every port of Europe is now swarming with men from Canada, agents of emigration, asking men to come to Canada, offering them lands free of cost. These Canadian free lands, however, have never prevented the immigrant from coming to this country. But these agents have now to add to their plausible stories that this country is engaged in a death-struggle, and that the taxation of this people is so enormous under which we groan that they will be ground to powder if they come here, and they ask the emigrants, "Will you go to this land of desolation, when you may go to Canada and get your lands for nothing, and, at the same time, have all the advantages of United States markets without being subjected to any of their taxation?" And is not that so? Ay, sir, it is so. Within twelve months after this reciprocity treaty—as by an infamous misnomer it is called—went into operation real estate in Canada rose twenty-five per cent., and within twelve months thereafter it rose fifty per cent. And why? Because my neighbor from the Canadas could go to our market any morning with me, in the same car, and receive the same price that I could get for my produce without incurring any of the burdens which I have to bear.

I say, therefore, that this question of emigration has become a national question. Now, sir, we owe Great Britain no particular favor, but I would scorn to bring any such consideration into this discussion. But are we to have no regard for the prosperity of our own people? Shall the right to bear American secure less than the right to be a Canadian? Are we to beat the bush and let somebody else catch the bird? I hear men who reside upon the border say, "We cannot bear this; we have given our children to the country, and now we are to be taken besides." The man upon the other side of the border says, "Your country is bankrupt; your currency is not worth a fraction; you are going to ruin, while we are prosperous and content; I go to your markets and fill my pockets, and your pockets are being constantly depleted by this horrid taxation."

Now, sir, one word as to this taxation and as to the Canadians. I do not expect to shut them out. I expect that they will enjoy our markets. God knows I do not want to destroy that people entirely, because some of them have been and still are most glorious friends of ours. I wish I could say that there were a majority of such there, but they are such men as I honor. I know they have nowhere else to go but to our markets. The "mother country," as they call it, has failed to protect them. The markets there do not suit them and are of no account to them, but they come to us for our markets. I say let them come, but let them not come to rob the brave men of our own country, who have given their best blood for the protection of our liberties. Let them not come to the exclusion of those who have birth-rights and who bear the heat and burden of the day. We will treat them as well as we do the most favored nation, as neighbors, but we will not feed and clothe them. If they are to enjoy our markets let it be on the same terms with other nations of the world. Why not? Is there any man opposed to giving this notice who can show what has ever been discovered during the working of this treaty which would induce us to believe that there is anything on the part of the Canadians that they can give us for what we give them? What reciprocal advantages can they return to us? What benefits do they give us for those we confer on them? They tell us that we may go to their markets. Why, sir, they have no markets. We may go there, but what is the use of going there if there are no markets? I know there are no markets there; I was born near there, and I know what I say. Fifty bullocks from Illinois would frighten every butcher out of Montreal!

The House will excuse my homely comparisons. I am, when at home, nothing but a farmer, and I thank God for it. If it were not for him what trade or commerce would we have? He has, by his industry and skill, brought this land into cultivation, and upon his labor the past and the future of our country rests securely.

Mr. Speaker, you have raised up the manufactures of Canada since this treaty went into operation. Since its ratification at every session of the provincial Parliament they have imposed duties upon our manufactures. Their manufactures are now going on and flourishing, for the very reason that they are driving out our manufactures. Our manufacturers take their capital and workmen and set up their establishments there. Do you see anything flattering in that? Is that one of the reciprocal advantages? Do our manufacturing interests ask us to continue that condition of things?

This is a subject in which I feel an interest, and I may, perhaps, show some warmth, but I know that I am right. I want the abrogation of the treaty to be unconditional. If they want anything of us, and can show that they can furnish us with some reciprocal advantage, then it will be time to consider the subject, but they have nothing to give us in return.

I will now say a few words as to the line of communication between the great West and the Atlantic. They have, at great expense, opened up a line of communication from Casco bay to Lake Michigan, and beyond to Grand Rapids.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for ten minutes longer. There was no objection; and it was agreed to accordingly.

Mr. BAXTER. I thank the House for its favor.

What was the argument of Mr. Galt, the Canadian finance minister, for the making of that line of communication? I am acquainted with Mr. Galt, and know him to be a talented and skillful man, for he took from John Bull's pocket millions that will never gladden his eyes again. What was the cry by which he took the money out of John Bull's pocket? Why it was this, that they were going to drain the great West. If this argument had not been used they could not have raised stock to have built sixty miles of the road.

Now, it has been said that if we abrogate this treaty they will take umbrage and deprive us of their trade. Do you believe that they will do that? If they did they would not make one per cent. to keep their lines of communication in repair. They want all the trade they can get, and they will take all they can get. Do you know of any country that wants to decrease its carrying trade? Our products will continue to go to the Canadas and to Casco bay—to Portland, that beautiful city, God bless her—whether the treaty be abrogated or not.

Gentlemen have talked about importing wool. I am happy to say that in a few days we will have something that will lead the people to believe that we have a protecting Government. If the tariff bill, which will soon be reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, shall be passed, by this House, you will see the great prairies of the West dotted all over with sheep, and within a few years after, instead of importing wool, we will supply the whole world with wool. Does any man know where it can be produced cheaper than here? Only give us support, only give us reason to believe that the people shall have support in that respect, and we shall be able to do that.

I am much obliged to the House for indulging me, and I will detain them but one moment longer. If you are going to pass this resolution I want to amend it a little. If this commission is to be provided for, I want its name changed to "A commission to arrange terms for continuing, in a dignified position, the wet-nurse of the sick British colonies." [Laughter.] I have done.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I shall not attempt to discuss all the questions involved in this resolution, but I will ask the indulgence of the House while I address myself very briefly to two questions growing out of it. It strikes me that in our present position, particularly in the Northwest, the great granary of this continent, we need the cheapest transportation to the seaboard that can possibly be obtained.

Until the breaking out of this rebellion the Northwest had one outlet unobstructed, in the Mississippi river, through which channel passed the greater amount of her surplus products. For three years that has been closed, but before it was closed the people of the Northwest, and I may say of the East too, felt the necessity of securing another cheap outlet to the ocean through the lakes and the St. Lawrence. If a necessity for that outlet was felt before the Mississippi river was closed, its importance addresses itself to us with double force at the present time. It is a question which comes home to the grain-growers of the West whether, while the great Mississippi river is closed to us, we will abrogate this treaty and close the St. Lawrence also.

It was said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] the other day, when discussing this question, that the free navigation of the St. Lawrence river was of very little importance to the people of any section of the country, and that since the adoption of this reciprocity arrangement with Great Britain but few cargoes had left the ports of the lakes and gone to the ocean. That may be true, but it is no answer to the other point. The very fact that the St. Lawrence has been open to our free navigation has had a tendency to keep down the rate of transportation from the western States to the Atlantic coast, because, although we did not send many cargoes of produce directly from the western lake ports through the lakes and the St. Lawrence to the Atlantic ocean, the cost of transportation was reduced by precisely the amount we would have had to pay under this treaty.

Again, the treaty has operated favorably to the grain-growing interest of the West in this, that, while this line of communication with the Atlantic ocean was unobstructed by duties, it forced those lines of canal and railroad communication between the western country and the seaboard, by which we reach New York and other points upon the seacoast, to carry produce at a low rate of freight, for the reason that if they exacted exorbitant rates that produce would seek an outlet to the Atlantic ocean through the St. Lawrence. Hence this treaty has operated in a double sense to cheapen the rate of transportation from the West to the Atlantic seaboard.

Now, sir, with the great Mississippi closed against us, and with the St. Lawrence closed against us, as it will be if you abrogate this treaty, you place our grain-growing interest in the West at the mercy of the canal and railroad corporations which exist between the western country and the Atlantic ocean. You place them in a position where they will compel us to pay just such tribute as their love of money may exact. Suppose you close this free outlet to the ocean by abrogating this treaty, you thereby place every shipping merchant in the West at the mercy of railroad and canal corporations controlling and operating the only channel through which we can reach the broad Atlantic. If, then, there ever was a reason why we should have free navigation of the St. Lawrence so as to operate as a check upon this exorbitant spirit that controls the corporations of the country, that reason operates with double force since our other water outlet to the ocean—the Mississippi river—has been closed to us by reason of this war.

Again, sir, it has been manifested throughout this discussion by those advocating the abrogation of this treaty that there is another reason, which does not appear upon the face of the measure, and it was alluded to by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.] They desire to abrogate this treaty in order that our Government may be placed in a position where they can tax the products of our western soil. The gentleman said that the treaty stands in the way of taxing our flour and grain; that during the existence of the treaty, owing to the peculiar circumstances in which the Government is placed, the Committee of Ways and Means have not thought proper to incorporate into the internal revenue bill a tax upon the flour and other products of the West. Sir, I oppose the abrogation of the treaty for that reason. The West have burdens enough to bear. The West has already felt the burdens of this Government during the war for the last four years more heavily than any other section of the country. You have not only withdrawn, in constituting your Army, the bone and sinew of the West and left our farms to the winds and storms for the want of labor to cultivate them, but now you propose to increase the taxation imposed on us in reaching the markets of the world, and, in addition to that, to tax the products of our soil. As a western man, representing an agricultural interest, I protest against the abrogation of this treaty, first, because it would place the agricultural interests of the West in the power of corporations that have no souls, by compelling us to use their lines of communication; and, second, because the avowed purpose is to saddle us in addition to that with increased taxation. For these reasons I am opposed to the abrogation of this treaty, and shall vote against it.

Mr. SWEAT. Mr. Speaker, it is so evidently impossible to discuss this question in ten minutes—a question of so great commercial and international importance—that I could not accept the ten minutes so courteously extended to me by the gentleman from New York were it not for the purpose of simply saying to the House that the people of the State which I in part represent here are not altogether in favor of the views presented by the gentleman from the fifth district [Mr. PIKE] last week. I would not, even for this purpose occupy the attention of the House for a moment if the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] were willing or disposed to occupy the whole of his time, because I believe that from the research which that distinguished gentleman has devoted to this subject his views are much more valuable and would have much more effect upon this House than anything I can say. I have read with great care the speech which he made some days since upon this subject, and I hope every gentleman in the House has read it, for to my mind it is very conclusive upon the matter under discussion. The views therein set forth are, in my judgment, not only correct and sound, but are just and wise, and worthy the careful consideration of all who would look at this subject dispassionately. To my mind it is the most exhaustive treatment that has been given to any subject that has come before the House this session. And in this respect I cannot forbear saying that it presents a very wide contrast to the remarks, which have been made by other gentlemen upon this question, which, I say in no offensive sense, have savored more of prejudice than of statesmanship.

Now, sir, this treaty was promulgated by the President of the United States on the 11th day of September, 1854, and we ought all to know something about its bearings and history. What are the propositions now before the House? One proposition, advocated by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL], is to give notice to the British Government that we propose to abrogate this treaty entirely; that we propose to shut down the gate at once; that we propose to say to them, "Hands off; we can take care of ourselves with out your aid; we wish no further commercial relations with you; get behind me, Satan."

Now, I am not aware whether that view is entertained by many members in this House or not. It does seem to me that the proposition of the gentleman from Vermont embodies an exceedingly narrow policy. It is an unwise policy; it is not the policy of statesmen; it is not prudent; it is not in accordance with the wishes or desires of the American people. I believe there will be no difficulty in voting down the proposition of the gentleman from Vermont.

The second proposition is to give notice of our intention to abrogate the treaty, and at the same time accompany it with a grant of power to the President to appoint commissioners for the purpose of reopening negotiations and perfecting arrangements with the colonies upon just principles of reciprocity.

It seems to me that this is a much more sensible proposition and much more for the interests of the country than that of the gentleman from Vermont. It embraces a policy in favor of which I could state many reasons if the time allowed me would permit. I would prefer the passage of a resolution different from either of the two now before the House, containing no provision for giving the notice to abrogate, but simply giving the President power by and with the consent of the Senate to appoint three commissioners, to confer with persons duly authorized by Great Britain in that behalf, to negotiate a new treaty, based upon the true principles of reciprocity between the two Governments and the people of both countries, with the view of enlarging the basis of the present treaty, and for the removal of existing difficulties. If I could by my word carry it I would be in favor of the last proposition; in other words, I think the time has not come, I think there is no pressing necessity for giving notice to the British Government of our desire to abrogate the treaty. We can do this at any time, we can do it next month, next fall, or we can do it two years from now, or at any subsequent time. After twelve months' notice given by either of the high contracting parties the treaty is abrogated. I suggest, therefore, that it is not yet time to give that notice, and I will be very frank and say that unless we can have another treaty I believe the present one upon the whole is better than no treaty at all. I have yet to learn that any board of trade or any association of commercial men, or any Legislature, has ever advocated the idea of an unconditional abrogation of the treaty existing between us and the British provinces.

I have risen more especially in order to present to the House resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of Maine at its last session in 1864, bearing upon this question. I ask the Clerk to read them.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, As the sentiment of the people of Maine, that sound policy and enlarged statesmanship dictate a judicious effort to secure just and equal communication of trade between all the countries of North America; and that it is the interest of this State, as well as of the whole country, to cultivate friendly relations with the provinces of British America, by such regulations as shall secure an advantageous reciprocity between the inhabitants of these provinces and the citizens of the United States; and for that end it is the duty of the Federal Government, while abrogating the existing treaty, to propose, and if possible secure, such new agreements and stipulations as will remove the objections that have been developed by experience, and more perfectly secure the objects held in view when the present treaty was entered into, said treaty having operated with peculiar hardship upon the interests of Maine.

Mr. SWEAT. I will say that this resolution was passed by the Legislature of Maine which recently adjourned, by an almost unanimous vote. Mr. Speaker, Maine is deeply interested in this question. I believe that it operates perhaps as injuriously upon the agricultural interests of Mainely as upon the agricultural interests of any other State, and yet the people of Maine do not desire an unconditional abrogation of this contract, while, as I understand, they would have it revised. My idea is that we can revise this treaty without abrogating it, and that we can treat better with these provinces while the present treaty is living than we can with a dead treaty.

It has been said that there exists an unfriendly feeling between the provinces and the United States. Sir, the people of the lower provinces of Canada are friends of the loyal citizens of the United States. However much the Canadian papers may have given an appearance of a public sentiment against us, it is a mistake to suppose that their interests are adverse to ours or that the people there are unfriendly to us.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I move that the gentleman be allowed to continue five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This, I understand, is to come out of the time of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands otherwise.

Mr. SPALDING. I object unless it comes out of the time of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the objection comes too late. The time of the gentleman from Maine has been extended five minutes.

Mr. SWEAT. Now, sir, the details of the operation and effect of this treaty I cannot, for obvious reasons, discuss. I would like very well to present some considerations in reply to those of my colleague from Maine [Mr. Pike] who is in favor of abrogating this treaty unconditionally. I could be able to show, if I had time, that several of the great interests of my State, namely, fisheries and ship-building, are very much promoted and aided by this treaty.

An able thinker and writer, Mr. Cyril Pearl, of Maine, has recently discussed the effect of this treaty upon the interests of that State, and, without any comments of my own, I will read a few sentences from his very conclusive argument on the subject. He says:

"As we are largely interested in navigation, we are equally so in ship-building, standing quite in the front rank of ship-building States. Various causes have combined to increase the cost of this building. One of these is the scarcity of ship-timber. A very large portion of the timber used in Maine, as well as other States, now comes from Canada and New Brunswick. The cost of iron, sails, and cordage is greatly increased by a high revenue tariff. Cut off this supply of timber, or tax it by a high tariff, and you transfer the ship-building from Maine to the shores of the St. Lawrence and the harbors of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, where the tariff on European iron, cordage, and sails, is about half what it is in Maine."

Again, he says:

"No State is more favorably situated to reap a rich harvest from the fisheries of the Grand Banks and the British American waters, than is Maine. A large amount of tonnage owned and built in the State, a large portion of her sons bred to the sea, her shores furnishing the most ample flats for supplying the fishing bait, her advantages for taking, curing, and marketing fish, are not equaled by any State in the Union. By the treaty immensely greater advantages in the fisheries are secured by the English Government to the United States, than are by the United States secured to British subjects; so that, if it be true that in other respects the treaty is of more benefit to them than it is to us, in this matter of the fisheries we have an immense advantage, which, by the abolition of reciprocity, we wantonly throw away."

The question is not whether the treaty is what we would have it—in my opinion it is not—but whether commissioners shall be appointed to revise and improve it. Sir, if there is to be a revision of the treaty it will need amendments in behalf of the interests of Maine quite as much as of the interests of any other State.

Now, sir, shall we be governed by such a course as this, or shall we be governed by passion, excitement, purposes of retaliation, or promptings of revenge? Because some Canadians have exhibited ill-feeling against this country shall we undertake to stultify ourselves by breaking up our commercial relations with them and destroying the interests of our own citizens to a large extent? I believe that some gentlemen upon this floor are actuated more by their prejudices against this people than by any other consideration in the line of policy they are advocating in this matter. Now, I submit to gentlemen upon this side of the House and upon the other side, that even if all that is alleged in reference to this Canadian people be true, whether we are justified in allowing ourselves to be governed by such considerations in determining a national, commercial question.

Shall we, if we can, negotiate a new treaty upon the principles of reciprocity? If we make the effort to revise this, and to make it mutually beneficial and satisfactory, and fail, I need not inform the House that we may then give notice of the abrogation of the existing treaty. It is said there is a necessity now of giving this notice, as though we could not even wait until the 11th of September, which will be the termination of the ten years, as though we could not even make an effort to come to a fair and honorable understanding.

With all the defects of the present treaty, the balance of trade for the last ten years has been in favor of the United States. By the report of the Secretary of the Treasury recently made, it appears that our exports to the British provinces were $26,445,683 more than the amount imported from them to the States.

I annex a table showing our trade with Canada since 1854. The statistics are as follows:

Total value of Canadian imports from all parts of the world.....	1854.	1855.	1856.	1857.	1858.	1859.	1860.	1861.	1862.

Showing the balance to be more than ten millions in our favor. And the statistics of our trade with the "maritime provinces" are equally striking, in showing it to be in our favor. For example, in 1863 our exports to Nova Scotia were $3,857,765, while our imports from that province in the same year were $1,869,672.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] is now entitled to the floor for ten minutes.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I shall not occupy my ten minutes. The proposition before the House is to give notice to Great Britain to terminate the treaty known as the reciprocity treaty. The next proposition is to request the President to appoint commissioners to negotiate another treaty.

I am in favor of the first part of the resolution; I am opposed to the last part of the resolution. I oppose it, first, because reciprocity between Canada and the United States is the last remnant of the old one-sided Democratic policy of the United States, always for the benefit of foreign nations and against the United States.

In the next place I am opposed to it for a more local reason; which is, that it keeps up a very lucrative trade in coal against the interest of the State of Maryland.

In the next place I am opposed to it for another reason. The Canadas have availed themselves of a freedom of legislation to modify their tariff so as to make it injurious to us without in terms violating the treaty.

It is impossible to prevent legislation of an unfriendly character which will evade any treaty we can adopt, unless that treaty involves absolute reciprocity, and embodies free trade to its fullest extent. I need not go into an argument to prove that a treaty at this time would be absolutely impossible; impossible for this reason—that we are now a heavily taxed people; the Canadians are a lightly taxed people; and any treaty of absolute reciprocity would give the Canadians the benefit of the difference between the taxes of Canada and the United States. Under that state of circumstances any such treaty must be one-sided—the profits must all belong to Canada.

In the next place we are not only heavily taxed now, but we shall continue so for the next generation, and probably for the next two or three generations, and whether our financial ability will be sufficient to bear us through this contest no man can yet say. It is impossible that we can make arrangements for free trade with Canada or with any other country in the world by treaty stipulations which are to bind our legislative discretion in so controlling ourselves as to render it impossible for us to change our internal tax laws from year to year as experience and the necessities of the time require. It is impossible that we can so far take away the legislative discretion of Congress as to render it impossible to adjust our internal tax system as the public interest requires. At this moment any gentleman on the Committee of Ways and Means will tell the House that they have been seriously interfered with in the adjustment of the bill for internal taxes, and they will be seriously interfered with in the adjustment of the bill for the tariff, by the fact that there are certain articles which are exempted from the operation of our laws by the treaty; and with reference to our internal tax that there are certain articles which being allowed to be brought in from the Canadas cannot be subjected to tax by the internal tax system without discriminating against our own people and in favor of the Canadians. This will enable us to go on and tax so far as our interest requires that they should be subjected to taxation. We show no hostile legislation; we do not anticipate hostile legislation with Canada. Each party will make the law to suit its own convenience and interest, and so far as commerce is mutually beneficial commerce will be left free.

The final consideration which controls my vote is that a commercial treaty of this kind is a direct invasion of our constitutional prerogative to regulate commerce with foreign nations. It is in direct contravention of the power of Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. It takes away from Congress its discretion if the treaty is valid, and to that extent it tends to transfer to the President and two thirds of the Senate prerogatives which the Constitution vests in Congress. Whatever power is vested here is to be exercised according to our will and according to our judgment, and not according to the will and judgment of foreign nations; and in my opinion we cannot abandon our discretion. It is imprudent to permit the Executive to make a treaty with foreign Powers which some majority here may abrogate as the supreme law of the land and bring us into difficulty. Let every department exercise its own prerogative. Let Congress regulate commerce, and let the other departments be confined to their proper spheres.

MR. LITTLEJOHN. Mr. Speaker, in times like the present, when the people of the country are overburdened with taxation to carry on an internal warfare against wicked men, it becomes us as wise statesmen to promote the prosperity of the people by judicious legislation in every department, in agriculture, manufacture, and commerce, so that they may be enabled to bear these heavy burdens. And therefore, sir, though in feeble health, I could not permit the vote to be taken on so important a question without occupying a few moments to protest against the abrogation of this treaty, for in my judgment no great system of trade and commerce should be hastily or arbitrarily interrupted. I shall content myself by a reference only to one or two great interests which will greatly suffer if this resolution be adopted. The question was asked yesterday, what have the railroads and canals to do with this subject? I reply, much, very much, as relates to the prosperity of the Northwest and the New England States, and the States of New York and Pennsylvania.

The canals and railroads of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New York are already taxed to their full capacity. In the time of a pressure of commerce, this period of the year when the produce of the West seeks a market, the railroads and canals, all constructed upon our own soil, are entirely inadequate to afford means for the transportation of the produce of the West.

And, sir, what have the necessities of the case brought upon the Northwest? The use of the railroads which cross the peninsula of Canada, of which there are four. The short railroad, side by side with the Welland canal, has within four years passed sixteen million bushels of grain, the product of the Northwest, from Lake Erie into Lake Ontario, for distribution in New York, New England, and the Canadas. The Great Western and the Grand Trunk railroads, with the Collingswood road, from Lake Huron to Toronto on Lake Ontario, have also borne the property of the producers of the West to a market, and I think I am safe in saying that those products, taking the pork and flour into consideration, are equivalent to fifteen or twenty million bushels of wheat.

Abrogate this treaty and you effectually close up these avenues, so far as the transportation of western products is concerned, when destined to one of our own ports on Lake Ontario; for it becomes dutiable, every bushel and barrel, when it arrives at an American port. Let me give an illustration: a vessel leaves Chicago with a cargo of grain, and arrives at Port Colborne or Port Sarina in Canada, and is there transferred to a railroad for transportation to Lake Ontario. It is there placed in another bottom, either American or British, to be delivered at Oswego, for transportation hence to New York by canal or railroads to New York, or at Cape Vincent, hence by rail to Rome and by the New York Central to New York, or at Ogdensburg, hence by rail to Rouse's Point and the eastern States. And what then? On its arrival at Oswego, Cape Vincent, or Ogdensburg the collector would demand a duty upon every barrel and every bushel of it.

Some gentlemen here say "No." There is no law upon the statute-book of the nation that will permit a collector to pass, duty free, property which has broken bulk, and passed through the territory of Canada, for the reason that it cannot be identified. There are no means of identifying it. If it is a cargo of wheat, it may be mixed in transitu with Canadian grain, or an entire cargo of Canadian grain may be substituted. Hence, when this property reaches the lower port it is dutiable.

Abrogate this treaty, and I ask gentlemen of the western States, if our means of transportation upon our own soil are so utterly overtaxed and burdened, what will you do with this surplus of your products which has found an outlet heretofore over the Canadian peninsula? Upon our own soil a barrier exists to transit from the upper to the lower lakes, at the falls of Niagara. The Canadians, by a liberal policy, have removed that barrier by the construction of the Welland canal and these railroads, and we are enjoying these benefits to-day. The greater portion of these western productions cross Canada by those canals and railroads, to find a market within our own territory in New England and New York.

I admit that this treaty does not work reciprocally throughout; but within the last ten years, in addition to the use of Canadian railroads and the St. Lawrence river, it has created an annual trade of over fifty million dollars along that frontier of two thousand miles. If you abrogate the treaty, do you expect to derive a revenue by imposing a duty on Canadian produce that can by any possibility compare with the profit now enjoyed by your citizens out of this trade? No, sir; not at all. Men engage in trade for profit, and the profit arising from the interchange of commodities between the two countries must be large upon an aggregate amount of fifty millions of money.

Is it wise at this time to interrupt so summarily this great and profitable commerce? Can it be done without inflicting great pecuniary injury upon the citizens who reside along our entire northern frontier?

It has been stated upon this floor that we have sold less to the British provinces than we have purchased. Strike out of existence 1854, and take the trade of the five years previous to 1854, and you will find that we sold them some twenty-four millions, if the report of the Secretary of the Treasury is to be relied upon, more than we purchased. Take the five years subsequent to 1854 and you will find that it was $38,000,000 as against $24,000,000 in the first five years. This is the result of the trade, showing under the treaty most favorable results.

Now, what is the interest of New York and New England and Pennsylvania upon this question? Pennsylvania is pouring into the lap of Canada the wealth of her soil, in the shape of coal, duty free, and New England is supplying the Northwest through Canadian avenues with her manufactures in exchange for its produce. It is for the interest of New England that there shall be a vast and mighty population upon these western prairies at the earliest possible day. Every twenty thousand emigrants located in Iowa or Illinois or in any western State support a factory on the rocky soil of New England. New York and the New England States are compelled to carry on a trade with the West through the mighty chain of lakes, over the Canadian railroads and through the canals of Canada, because our own Government has failed to remove the barrier at Niagara falls by the construction of a canal upon her own side.

Sir, I had hoped that this resolution would assume the form of the appointment of commissioners to make more perfect the trade between the two countries and not an abrogation of the treaty, and I still hope that when it shall be brought to a vote the abrogation feature will be stricken out from the resolution and that it will stand adopted appointing commissioners to render more perfect a system of trade which has conferred so many and such vast benefits upon the residents of the northern frontier.

MR. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, not a single gentleman has addressed the House upon this subject who has not admitted at the outset that the treaty operates injuriously to the United States. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. SWAZZ] has seen fit to characterize the original proposition introduced by me as unwise, narrow, and unstatesmanlike. I do not profess, sir, to have such broad, statesmanlike, and wise views as the gentleman who represents the city of Portland, who, by the by, practically confines his views to the city limits of Portland and not to his State, for I have in my possession the resolution passed by that State last year, which was almost unanimously passed, in favor of the unconditional termination of the treaty. Therefore, if I have learned anything that is unwise or narrow or unstatesmanlike, I have learned it from Maine herself, and I appeal from the gentleman to the people of his own State. This year her Governor also recommended its abrogation. To be sure the resolution which was passed then was a sort of a mongrel thing asking for its termination but presenting the case very much as it has been presented by the substitute proposed by the Committee on Commerce, and perhaps borrowing the idea from it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the original proposition, as introduced by me, is couched in the language which has been used by this Government in like cases for seventy years. There is nothing in it that could justly give offense in any quarter. It merely recites, according to the provisions of the treaty, our wish that it should be terminated. It does not even go upon the broad ground that nothing further is to be done, for it contemplates that there will be further legislation or negotiation, as will be seen from these words:

And that the attention of the Governments of both countries may be directed to the adoption of all proper measures for an amicable adjustment of any matters of difference or dispute which may remain or arise in consequence of the termination of said treaty, &c.

Mr. Speaker, in relation to this subject, I am more than ever convinced that there is not a single interest in this country, whether commercial, agricultural, manufacturing, or fishing, that is subserved by this treaty or that can be. If the distinguished gentleman from New York should be appointed one of these commissioners, notwithstanding his ingenuity in the discussion of this subject, and his ability, I have no doubt that he might spend years with other gentlemen on such a commission, and spend them very pleasantly too, but if this treaty should not be terminated by a vote of this House requesting the President to give the proper notice, it never would be changed or improved by the labors of such a commission. We all know the beauty of procrastination whenever diplomacy is employed. Even, therefore, if we are to have a new treaty, the proper course for us to pursue is at once to give the notice, and then if the Canadian or the British Government have a proposition to make that we think will be really reciprocal or beneficial to us, we shall then be free to adopt or reject it. But first let us see what they have to propose. When it is admitted on all hands that the treaty operates injuriously, are we to come forward and beg for the continuance of such a treaty? Will this House again surrender in advance one of its constitutional prerogatives?

Why, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] this morning grows eloquent over the fact that it is proposed to tax the grain and flour of the West. It is possible the gentleman has made a mistake. Is he now unwilling that the productions of the vast regions of the Canadas drained by the great lakes shall, before they come into competition with those of the West, pay a tax? Will it hurt the West to tax those who enjoy our markets and our war prices something for so priceless a boon? Gentlemen know, I presume, that if we tax Canadians ten cents a bushel upon their barley they must perforce still send it to our market. Have gentlemen in the West any objection to such a proposition as that? There is no danger of driving them away from our market; they cannot dispose of any considerable portion of their agricultural products unless they bring them to our markets. If they paid into our Treasury twenty-five per cent. they would then sell here, and realize twenty-five per cent. more than at home. Then I ask the gentleman who represents the New Bedford and Nantucket district whether, if we should tax the fish which come into competition with the fish his constituents catch, they would object to that? Do they object to our placing a tax upon whale oil and all other products of the sea which now come in duty free? But it is said that if this treaty is terminated the facilities for bringing the products of the West will be diminished—that they could not have the use of the railroads, the St. Lawrence river, and canals within the Canadian provinces. Why, sir, our right to use those canals may be abrogated by England at any moment without interfering with the treaty itself. By article four it is provided that they may terminate that commerce whenever they choose. That article reads as follows:

"ART. 4. It is agreed that the citizens and inhabitants of the United States shall have the right to navigate the river St. Lawrence and the canals in Canada used as a means of communicating between the great lakes and the Atlantic ocean with their vessels, boats, and crafts, as fully and freely as the subjects of her Britannic Majesty, subject only to the same tolls and other assessments as now are, or may hereafter be, exacted of her Majesty's said subjects; it being understood, however, that the British Government retains the right of suspending this privilege on giving due notice thereof to the Government of the United States."

They can suspend this part of the treaty any time they please; but, as my colleague has suggested, their railroads and canals cannot live without our patronage. They will not bite the hand that feeds them, so that there need be no apprehension on our part of being denied the poor privilege of using their railroads and canals in consequence of the termination of this treaty. Besides, if there was, we have an ample remedy. The transit of merchandise from Portland to Canada is through our permission, and now gratuitous.

Now, in relation to our commerce, which is diminishing, and ought to be increased. Under the operation of the treaty, vessels load in provincial and come to our ports, taking such freights as they can find to carry back; but our vessels must start out empty, or nearly so, and go there to obtain a return freight, which they are unwilling to do, and the result is that almost the entire business with the provinces is now carried on in British or provincial bottoms.

There is another question greater than all these, involving the rights of this House. From Jay's treaty down to the date of this unfortunate treaty this House has always resisted these commercial treaties. The Democratic or Republican party has always been opposed to the doctrine of the President and Senate exercising control over commercial matters, and have always demanded that the House should be consulted in all treaties wherein an appropriation was involved. All parties up to 1854 resisted these commercial treaties, and as late as in 1844, as I said in my former speech, the Senate itself, when called on to ratify a similar treaty, declared that it was "an invasion of the uniform practice of the Government to change by treaty duties laid by law."

If the Senate and President can make a treaty changing in any respect the revenue laws, they may in a short time monopolize the whole power of the Government delegated to Congress over the subject of commerce and to the House over subjects of taxation, and set the legislation of Congress at defiance as well as the rights of the House of Representatives. I trust that the House will consider that it is entirely wise and statesmanlike that we shall give this notice in the decorous and proper terms contained in the proposition before us. I am sure that no member here will be actuated in this matter by any ill-will toward or fear of the British Government, and our experience for the last two or three years certainly does not inspire us with any lively sense of gratitude for favors received. The treaty has not brought us the gospel of good-will. It is well known that in many parts of the provinces the people are as hostile toward this Government as any part of the South, and that feeling still reigns predominant in Great Britain, as their action in the case of the Georgia, fitted at Liverpool, recently returned, abundantly shows. And I presume no gentleman in this House doubts that but for the recognition by the British Government of the rights of the southern confederacy as belligerents the rebellion could not have lasted twelve months.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. With the permission of the House, I desire to reply a moment to my colleague from the Chicago district, [Mr. ARNOLD,] who dwelt very largely upon the fact that if this treaty were abrogated one great channel of communication with the West would be closed up. Now, as I understand it, under that treaty the power was reserved by the British Government, without any notice at all, to close that communication, and if that Government chooses at any time to exercise that power, I ask my colleague how the condition of the West in respect to these means of communication is to be relieved.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say in response to that, that under the treaty they have the power, but we have a greater power in reserve if we choose to exercise it over them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am for the unconditional abrogation of the treaty; every member must see that the treaty as it now exists ought to be changed, and if it is to be changed, I say let us in the first place abrogate the treaty entirely. If Great Britain, which derives, as I contend, all the benefits of the treaty, wants another, let her come and ask us, and do not let us go to her.

Mr. MORRILL. If the treaty should be abrogated I should not be unwilling to agree to some fair proposition by legislation, and legislation mainly. But I wish the House to keep the subject under its own control, so that we may have some countervailing legislation whenever that may become proper and necessary.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, in the consideration which I have given to this question I have regarded it from no sectional or partisan point of view, but have studied it in its international aspects, and thus I shall continue to present it.

I know there are objectionable features in the working of the treaty, but with very few exceptions the points raised in opposition to it were presented in the report of the Committee on Commerce and also in my remarks when opening this discussion. I named impartially the merits and the defects, the advantages and evils existing in the present arrangements. Nothing was suppressed, nothing was exaggerated, and I endeavored to judge the subject with the utmost possible justice and impartiality. I confide in the honor and character of this House to treat this great international question as to our northern neighbors in the same candid and honest spirit of good-will and truth with which we rightfully wish them to regard us and our affairs. I trust this House will rise above mere local considerations. It must rise above prejudice. I have no fear of Great Britain. I have considered this question as one affecting many of the most important interests of this nation. Thus I trust this House also will consider it, uninfluenced by any fear or intimidation of Great Britain. I cannot regard with complacency the frequent assertions made by several honorable members as to our national reputation. There is no need to vindicate it. It should be, like the character of Cæsar's wife, above suspicion, and I am impatient when I hear it unnecessarily asserted or called into question.

I propose to review as briefly as I can the chief remarks made during this debate in opposition to the treaty, or rather to any equitable and mutually beneficial and satisfactory arrangement of our commercial relations with the provinces.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] referred to the treaty of 1817—a treaty entirely irrelevant to the present subject. We have the power on a notice of six months to terminate that treaty; but there is no necessary connection between the two. If the resolution of the Committee on Commerce be adopted, questions regarding the armaments of both nations on the lakes may, I think, without impropriety be discussed and very probably would be discussed by the proper authorities on both sides.

It has been attempted to influence the action of this House by the introduction of letters from different individuals. I have not endeavored to acquire any support for my views from this source, although I have received many letters from various gentlemen of eminent ability and character. I may, however, be permitted to give portions of letters from Hon. Edward Everett, who was Secretary of State during a considerable part of the negotiations leading to the treaty. When acknowledging the receipt of a copy of the report of the Committee on Commerce in 1862, he said:

"It seems quite evident that the provincial Government has violated the spirit of the treaty in various ways. I trust, however, that there will be no countenance given to the threat of abrogating it, a measure never admissible but in a case of the greatest provocation from the other party. Having the interests of Canada West enlisted in favor of a just policy under the treaty, and I presume also the sympathies of the Imperial Government in the same direction, there will be no difficulty, I imagine, in persuading the provincial Parliament that there is nothing to be gained by a war of tariffs."

In a subsequent letter he said:

"In saying that I hoped the abrogation of the treaty would not be thought of, I meant its abrogation before the time appointed by the instrument itself. When that time arrives, if it shall appear that the colonial legislation is in contravention of the spirit and policy of the convention, security must be taken for a change in that legislation, or the convention be given up, which I trust will not be the case."

"I have reason to think we shall have the Imperial Government with us in a fair and honest execution of the convention."

I will in passing make one remark in regard to the Constitution so far as this question is concerned. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] occupied a column and a half of his speech in attempting to show that no treaty can deprive us of our right to legislate in regard to revenue measures. All I have to say is that this treaty did not deprive this honorable body of any portion of our rights in this respect. The treaty was imperative until the act was passed by this House on the 5th day of August, 1854, for the purpose of carrying the treaty into effect. The House may by its own sanction and by a solemn act give effect to such a treaty.

I shall, without any further general remarks, confine myself mainly to the consideration of the chief points which have been most frequently urged in favor of abruptly terminating our commercial arrangements with the provinces.

The main assertions on which the member from Maine [Mr. PIKE] relied as regards the statistics or business aspect of the case are that our trade to the provinces has created a balance against us. In one form or another this assertion has frequently been made. The question he has raised is one of easy solution, and needs nothing more than a brief examination of the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury compiled from the duly authenticated official records. The treaty went partially into operation in 1854, extensive transactions having that year been made, based upon the expectation that drawbacks would be, as I am told they ultimately were, allowed. That was the year of the treaty—neither before nor after. Its transactions were mixed. Therefore its trade should be excluded from the statistics of commerce in the periods before and after the treaty. No full and fair inference can be drawn from that year, as it belongs to neither epoch. In 1853, the year before the treaty, our imports from the provinces were $7,550,718 and our exports to them were $13,140,642; leaving a balance in our favor of less than $6,000,000; and the change was so great that in 1855, the year after the treaty took effect, our exports increased to $27,806,020, being more than double those of 1853. As these imports in 1855 were $15,136,734, the balance in our favor the year after the treaty was more than $12,600,000; a larger amount than we either sold to or bought from them with one exception, in any year before the treaty. Yet it is at least implied by the member from Maine that when we made the treaty there was annually a balance in our favor, paid to us in gold, of about sixteen million dollars; a sum larger by about three millions than we ever sold to them in any year whatever before the year when the treaty was made.

I deeply deplore the misrepresentations which are current on this subject. Do they proceed from a conscious and willful desire to mislead us on a subject of so great importance? I hope not. I am not willing to think they do. Few national injuries are more pernicious than the perversion of facts in the national councils, thus misleading and betraying the people by poisoning one of the fountains whence they derive their information. There may be some—I trust they are not many—in this House who do not see that however popular this kind of betrayal may be for a time, it not only inflicts an injury upon our pecuniary interests and our honor, but, creating and cherishing a habitual sense of national injury and wrong, leads us in the end to such results as we are now experiencing in the deadly struggle between the different sections of this Union. I attribute no unworthy motives to any one, but whoever will examine the official records of our own Government will find that my statements are accurate.

It was said by the honorable member—he repeated the remark several times—that the balance of our trade with the provinces is against us. The statement appears slightly modified in his remarks as printed in the Globe, but is substantially retained there. Did he mean during the last year of which we have official information? It was then nearly two millions in our favor. Did he mean during the whole time since the treaty went into operation? In that time it was more than twenty-six millions in our favor. There is nothing vague about this. There is no mystery in the figures. There is no need of passion or declamation. The solution is as easy as that of any school-boy sum in arithmetic or of any ordinary settlement of accounts between individuals. I find my data on the sixth page of the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to the resolution of this House on the 17th day of last December, asking for information as to the operations of this treaty. We asked him for information, and it is furnished to us. Shall we ignore it, and substitute for it such conclusions as our several fancies may suggest? We may in this way point a paragraph or lend some illusory brilliance to a speech; but this is not statesmanship. It does not accord with our duty to the nation. The balance of gold on which so much stress has been laid was not paid by us to the provinces but by them to us. It amounted to $26,445,692. This is the state of affairs as to which the honorable member says he "would if necessary use force to put an end to an alliance so injurious."

The subject has been treated as if there were no difference between paying money for foreign gewgaws or costly luxuries and for such articles as are daily and hourly necessary to the support of our Army and Navy, and for that yet larger army—the industrial army—the laboring population, on whom the existence of the Army and Navy and of all classes of society must depend. With exceptions too trivial to be worthy of notice, all our importations free under the treaty are the plainest necessities of life. It is an outrage upon the best and wisest principles of modern political science to tax them. They are an essential part of all that enables us to pay taxes, and support either Army or Navy—of all that makes us strong or prosperous either in war or peace.

There is another consideration to be regarded in connection with this balance of trade in relation to these colonies—a reason why this trade is not identical in principle with many other transactions, but is an exceptional case. I will illustrate the point by a familiar and practical example. It is readily understood that if a merchant or dealer goes over to Canada, and there buys certain articles—say, for instance, a thousand barrels of flour or five thousand bushels of wheat—he does an act which, so far as it goes, creates a balance against the United States, to be paid in gold or its equivalent. But if he sends the flour or wheat over American railroads or canals to Boston or New York, and thence has it reshipped to England, France, Cuba, or elsewhere, he, by his series of actions, gives freight and profit to our inland carriers and Atlantic shippers, employs a large number of our people in various occupations, and brings home at last the original outlay, increased by the additional sum invested for freight, storage, commissions, and labor of various kinds, together with additional profit for himself, all in the same precious metal or its equivalent. Gentlemen who reason as the honorable member has argued forget that this nation has commercial dealings; and that in such a case as I have described, it is quite as just to complain of the balance of trade being against us as it would be for a merchant who has extensive transactions in all parts of the world to complain of the farmer or manufacturer from whom he buys more than he sells to him. He buys from one man for the purpose of selling to another.

While the honorable member takes a narrow and limited view of our commercial relations with the provinces, he has gone a long way back in his statements as to the colonial policy of Great Britain. He quoted certain laws enacted by the Government of that country a hundred and fifty years ago, ordaining that none of the colonial trade should be carried in any but British vessels. Since the time to which he referred five generations of men, with their inventions, their experience, and their changes, have lived and died. The folly of those laws was long ago demonstrated. They were tried, found wanting, and have been repealed. Even the colonial tariffs discriminated in favor of British and colonial produce and manufactures until 1843, when these discriminations were abolished. The colonies now make their own tariffs and tax British manufactures at high rates, to encourage production in their own territory. For several years—for all the years, so far as I know—since the treaty the trade of Canada with the United States was greater not only than with Great Britain, but than with all other countries but our own added together.

I wish to accept facts as I find them. Should I do otherwise I should be unworthy of a place in this House, and false in my duty to my country. Coming down as closely as I can to the present time and to the special point named by the honorable member, I find on reference to our own reports on commerce and navigation that during the last five years the entries and clearances of tonnage employed in carrying on the trade between the United States and the British North American provinces have been about fifty per cent. in favor of this country. They were 20,763,512 of United States tonnage, and 13,844,919 of foreign tonnage.

A very large increase in our exports to the provinces, both of our own manufactures and agricultural produce and of goods of foreign origin, did result from the treaty, as was reasonably expected. Our domestic exports increased from $7,404,087 in 1853 to $15,806,642 in 1855 and $22,714,697 in 1856, having doubled and trebled in periods of one and two years respectively. Our exports of goods of foreign origin were $5,736,555 in 1853, being larger in that year than they had ever been before. In 1855, the year next after the treaty, they were $11,999,378, having doubled in full accordance with the natural tendency of the treaty. My statements rest on the official authority of our own Government. They cannot be refuted. No attempt has been made to meet them. No notice was taken of them by the honorable member or by any gentleman who has spoken in opposition to the resolutions of the Committee on Commerce.

A few more words as to this balance of trade. Before the treaty Canada admitted the cereals and many other products free of duty. Consequently we sold to her although we refused to buy from her. The result was that a large amount of these articles went abroad through the St. Lawrence, to the injury of our merchants, canals, railroads, seaports, ocean shipping, and of all classes of our population. The year after the treaty the trade by the St. Lawrence decreased to the amount of $15,203,600, and so soon as the routes and markets of the United States were opened the whole was transferred to our carriers, for in the same time the trade to the United States increased $15,856,624, or from $24,971,096 to $40,827,720. In this way a change was made in the "balance of trade," and that change was beneficial.

Much has been said in this connection about the Alabama and the Florida. I fully concur with those who have condemned the outrages perpetrated by these vessels. The honorable member spoke at some length of the southerly port of Nassau. I am unable to discover in his remarks upon this subject any adequate reason for our injuring ourselves by curtailing or destroying a profitable trade with the colonies in North America, still less why we should not endeavor to make it more profitable than it is, and to place it on a just and equitable basis. He discussed at one time two subjects which have no proper or logical connection with each other. All such inquiries as I have been able to make, and a careful study of a considerable portion of the organs of provincial opinion, from day to day, since the beginning of the war, have led me to the result that although, as must be the case in every country where freedom of thought and utterance prevail, where men think and speak for themselves; some will be right and some will be wrong, (and the various minds of individual colonists have arrived at very different conclusions as to the present war, some taking the side of the South, some friendly to the North, and approving of the course of the Administration, and some equally friendly, but believing that a different policy would have been more conducive to our interests,) the flagrant expressions adverse to us, and which sometimes obtain wide circulation, are the words—only of individuals or cliques, and not of the vast majority or masses of the people of these provinces on whom it is proposed as retaliation to inflict commercial injuries which will equally injure our own people, before we have made any effort to remove those obstacles which some years after the treaty took effect have prevented each nation from reaping the full benefits which would naturally have accrued from it. I have already, in my previous remarks, explained the operation of the increased tariffs of Canada, especially of the tariff of 1859. These enactments, which substituted artificial restrictions for free and natural laws, should not be mistaken for the principles or results to which they are in direct contradiction. I am desirous of remedying the evils thus created.

It is argued that the treaty has deprived us of revenue. During the last year the imports and exports between the United States and Canada of articles free under the treaty were nearly equal. If we levy duties on their productions, they may do the same on ours. This principle is a two-edged sword. Or they may admit our products free of duty as they did before the treaty, and thus be the carriers of a considerable portion of our produce as well as of their own. When a revenue was paid to our Government on Canadian productions, the provincial railroads and means of communication were imperfect, and its population was comparatively scanty. By renewing the duties we shall drive away the trade and render our people less able to pay taxes. The utmost amount of revenue the Government can derive from duties on colonial productions is inconsiderable compared with the loss of commerce we shall sustain, and the consequent loss of employment to the laborer and profit to the merchant or capitalist.

Under a reciprocal system, instead of attempting to make money by restriction and injuries, each will partake of those natural advantages which have appropriately and eloquently been termed "the gratuities of nature." Otherwise, if a restrictive policy is mutually adopted, we destroy the trade of such ports as Oswego and Portland, and two or three men will be employed to do the work of one, as in the case of compelling the Canadians to carry sugar from Cuba to Toronto round by way of the St. Lawrence instead of carrying it ourselves for adequate remuneration to the benefit of our people through New York, Boston, or Portland; or, in the case of coal, compelling the people of each country to carry this essential element of success from remote mines, hundreds of miles from the places where it is used. It is as necessary to the comfort and maintenance of the poor as to the accumulations and luxuries of the rich. It saves labor, enabling one man, through the creation and application of steam, to do the work of twenty. Thus it creates wealth and power, diffusing its beneficent results through every department of society on each side. It is a just illustration of the whole subject. Let us place no fetters upon these beneficial exchanges, nor compel the people of either country to a perpetual system of labor in vain, wasting in circuitous routes the labor and capital which might be profitably expended. The waste of labor is a waste of human beings and of life.

As to smuggling, which it is said exists to a great extent on our frontier, I ask if it is likely to be diminished by the increased duties created by our own recent tariffs, or by entering upon a system of commercial hostilities with the whole population of the provinces and stimulating all their sympathies in favor of the smuggler. Neither we nor they are alone in the world, or can carry out in all respects our own wishes and desires. England and France, with a most expensive and numerous coast-guard, were never able to prevent smuggling except by mutual liberality. Still less can we prevent it from countries which are so near to us that a merchant may have one half of his store in the United States and the other in the provinces. Already two free ports exist in Canada. All goods from the United States, from France, Germany, England, and all other parts of the world, are admitted free of any duty into these ports, which are not, as might be inferred from their names, mere cities. One of them in the Northeast extends, at the mouth of the St. Lawrence, over a sea-coast twelve or fifteen hundred miles in extent. The other "free port" is in the Northwest, and, under the name of Sault Ste. Marie, includes practically a coast on Lakes Huron and Superior and their islands of more than one thousand miles in extent. Do those who oppose the appointment of commissioners and our whole system of reciprocity think it is wise to reject all approach to any unity of legislation between us and the provinces, and impel them to an extension of anything like this system of free ports, which already extends over some twenty-five hundred miles of coast, until it prevails over the remainder of the provinces? It is a case where each Government can assist the other or injure it.

Various memorials from different parts of the United States have been presented to Congress and referred to the Committee on Commerce. They proceed from persons having distinct interests and living, some of them on the western and some of them on the eastern extremity of our frontier. Although they all unite in requesting modifications of the treaty, not one of them is in favor of its unconditional abrogation. There is no exception. The State of Maine in March last, through its Legislature, passed resolutions decisively in favor of the appointment of commissioners to negotiate a more extended and impartial system of commercial relations with the provinces; and in my opinion scarcely any State in the Union has a stronger interest in a liberal settlement of this question.

After mature deliberation, the Committee on Commerce believes that the appointment of commissioners on both sides to consult together as to the course most conducive to our mutual interest, combines more advantages than any other plan. The treaty was made between the United States and Great Britain, but as regards the management of financial affairs the colonies are independent of Great Britain. More than this, the British North American colonies of Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward's Island, and Newfoundland are commercially distinct and independent of each other, each placing the other provinces, and the United States, Great Britain, France, and other countries upon a footing of equality as regards importations. The subject involves on our side an adjustment of the interests of the eastern, central, and western States—an earnest and full consideration of the course best adapted to promote manufactures, agriculture, and commerce, and the removal of such restrictions as exist, by means of the legislation of Canada, inconsistent with the general expectations when the treaty was made. No other plan can bring the parties whose interests are involved so closely and directly into communication with each other, and its importance demands the full and undivided attention of able and comprehensive statesmen.

I will say in addition that the terms of the resolution do not seem to be fully understood. The resolution contemplates that the notice shall be given at the proper time unless in the interim a convention shall have met and agreed upon a treaty based upon the true principles of reciprocity, and that whenever Great Britain shall indicate a willingness to enter into negotiations for that purpose, the President is authorized to appoint commissioners to ascertain on what terms such a treaty can be made.

ENROLLED BILLS:

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 407) authorizing the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil; and

An act (H. R. No. 432) for the relief of the citizens of Denver, in the Territory of Colorado.

RECIPROCITY TREATY—RESUMED.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD,] which will be reported by the Clerk.

The amendment was reported, and is as follows: Strike out "and required to give notice to the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland that it is the wish and intention of the Government of the United States of America to terminate the said treaty at the end of twelve months from the expiration of ten years from the time when the said treaty went into operation as aforesaid, such notice to be given at the expiration of the said term of ten years, to the end that the said treaty may be abrogated as soon as it can be done under the provisions thereof, unless a new convention shall before that time be concluded between the two Governments by which the provisions shall be abrogated or so modified as to be mutually satisfactory to both Governments; and that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint three commissioners, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the revision of said treaty, and to confer with other commissioners duly authorized thereby, whenever it shall appear to be the wish of the Government of Great Britain to negotiate a new treaty between the two Governments and the people of both countries, based upon true principles of reciprocity, and for the removal of existing difficulties;" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

By and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint three commissioners to confer with persons duly authorized by Great Britain in that behalf, to negotiate a new treaty, based upon the true principles of reciprocity between the two Governments and the people of both countries, with the view of enlarging the basis of the present treaty, and for the removal of existing difficulties: Provided, That in case no new treaty shall be agreed to by both Governments, then, in such case, the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to give the notice terminating said treaty according to the provisions thereof.

Mr. ARNOLD demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment, and tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CHARLER and Mr. AMES were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes forty-three; a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 54, nays 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Aucona, Arnold, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Cobb, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. DRIGGS stated that he was called out a few moments since to see a wounded soldier, and had paired off with Mr. BLISS, who was still absent.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE stated that he was paired off with Mr. ALLEY; that he would have voted in the affirmative, while Mr. ALLEY would have voted in the negative.

The question next recurred on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] for the resolution reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The substitute is as follows:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required by the fifth article of the said reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, A. D. 1854, for the termination of the same.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Sweat, Thomas, Voorhees, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—82.

So the substitute was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WOODBRIDGE stated that he would have voted in the affirmative but that he was paired off with Mr. ALLEY.

Mr. DRIGGS stated that he should have voted in the affirmative had he not been paired off.

Mr. J. W. WHITE stated that Mr. McKINNEY had gone to Fredericksburg to look after some wounded soldiers.

Mr. FRANK stated that Mr. MARVIN was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SLOAN moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Aucona, Arnold, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Don-

Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Eliza B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, and Wilson—74.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

The question recurred on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move to lay the joint resolution on the table. I think we had better let the treaty run another year.

Mr. FENTON demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANCONA. I ask that the joint resolution be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution, and also the preamble, as the motion to lay the resolution on the table carries the preamble with it.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolution as follows:

Whereas, under the treaty made by the United States with Great Britain, proclamation of which was made by the President of the United States on the 11th of September, 1854, for the purpose of extending reciprocal trade between the British North American colonies and the United States, nearly all the articles which Canada has to sell are admitted into the United States free of duty, while heavy duties are now imposed upon many of those articles which the people of the United States have to sell with the intention of excluding them from the Canadian markets; and whereas the President of the United States, in the first session of the Thirty-Sixth Congress, caused to be submitted to the House of Representatives an official report setting forth the inequality and injustice existing in our present intercourse with Canada, subversive of the true intent of the treaty, owing to the subsequent legislation of Canada; and whereas by the fifth article of the treaty provision was made that it should remain in force for ten years from the date at which it should go into operation, and further until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties should give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same, each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said term of ten years, or at any time afterwards; and whereas by a further proclamation issued by the President of the United States, bearing date the 16th day of March, 1855, it was declared that the said treaty should go into effect and be observed on the part of the United States; and whereas it is desirable that friendly relations should be continued between the United States and the British North American provinces, and that commercial intercourse should be hereafter carried on between them upon principles reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory to both parties: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to give notice to the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland that it is the wish and intention of the Government of the United States of America to terminate the said treaty at the end of twelve months from the expiration of ten years from the time when the said treaty went into operation as aforesaid, such notice to be given at the expiration of the said term of ten years, to the end that the said treaty may be abrogated as soon as it can be done under the provisions thereof, unless a new convention shall before that time be concluded between the two Governments by which the provisions shall be abrogated or so modified as to be mutually satisfactory to both Governments; and that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint three commissioners, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the revision of said treaty, and to confer with other commissioners duly authorized therefor, whenever it shall appear to be the wish of the Government of Great Britain to negotiate a new treaty between the two Governments and the people of both countries, based upon true principles of reciprocity, and for the removal of existing difficulties.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 73, nays 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baxter, Beaman, Boyd, Broomall, William G. Brown, Cobb, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Deming, Eckley, Eden, English, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Hooper, Asahel

W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Law, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, McBride, McClurg, Middleton, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Price, William H. Randall, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Thayer, Tracy, Eliza B. Washburne, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Williams, Wilder, and Wilson—73.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Dixon, Donnelly, Edgerton, Eldridge, Eliot, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Griswold, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hutchins, Jenckes, Kalbfleisch, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Knapp, Lazear, Littlejohn, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, Pendleton, Perham, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Pruy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Scofield, Scott, Sloan, Spalding, John B. Steele, Sweet, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Ward, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Joseph W. White, Windom, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—76.

So the House refused to lay the joint resolution on the table.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WARD demanded the previous question on the preamble.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the preamble was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to postpone the joint resolution till the second Tuesday in December next.

Mr. WARD. Is that motion in order after the previous question being seconded?

The SPEAKER. The previous question was called on the preamble, and exhausted itself.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved the previous question on the motion to postpone.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. What would be the effect of postponing the joint resolution?

Several MEMBERS. The effect would be to postpone it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It would be postponed till the second Tuesday in December.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. In the mean time could action be taken on a new report from the Committee on Commerce?

The SPEAKER. If the committee were called again, it might report another bill on the same subject.

Mr. STEVENS. Will not this joint resolution, if postponed, come up as a matter of course next session?

The SPEAKER. It will come up immediately after the ship-canal bill, which has been postponed until the second Tuesday in December. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think that is a good reason why this joint resolution should go over to next session. If we postpone canal propositions, we had better also postpone propositions in regard to our trade and commerce.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to postpone.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Baxter, Beaman, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Cobb, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Deming, Eckley, Eden, Eldridge, English, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Charles M. Harris, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Thayer, Tracy, Eliza B. Washburne, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—77.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Brooks, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Dixon, Donnelly, Edgerton, Eliot, Fenton, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Harding, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Hutchins, Jenckes, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Long, Mallory, McAllister, McDowell, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, Pendleton, Perham, Perry, Pomeroy, Pruy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Scott, Sloan, Spalding, John B. Steele, Sweet, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Ward, William B.

Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—72.

So the joint resolution was postponed till the second Monday in December next.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was postponed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

KENTUCKY CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. SMITHERS. I desire to give notice to the House that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal, I will ask the attention of the House to the consideration of the contested-election case of McHenry and Yeaman.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the Iowa land bill; and insisted on its amendments to the Army appropriation bill, and agreed to the conference asked for by the House.

BUSINESS ON SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to proceed to business on the Speaker's table. The special object that I have in view is to get the amendments to the bill to increase the pay of soldiers referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, with leave to report at any time.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSUL AT HONG KONG.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the Senate amendment to a joint resolution (H. R. No. 63) to settle the account of James Keenan, late consul at Hong Kong, China.

The amendment was to insert after the word "money" the words "in the Treasury;" so that it will read, "out of any money in the Treasury."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DAWSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF THE ARMY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the Senate amendments to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 145) to equalize the pay of soldiers of the United States Army.

The amendments were read.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the Senate amendments be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, with leave to report at any time; and on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the amendments be printed.

It was so ordered.

PERUVIAN CLAIMS.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move to go into the Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of taking up the bill to provide for the payment of Peruvian claims, of which there is a necessity for its immediate passage.

PUNISHMENT OF GUERRILLAS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to yield to enable me to ask the unanimous consent of the House to present and have considered at the time from the Military Committee a bill for the punishment of guerrillas.

Mr. STEVENS. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. ANCONA. I must object to the reporting of that bill from the Military Committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is that a bill for the punishment of those guerrillas who shot our wounded soldiers?

Mr. GARFIELD. It would include those.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I think nobody has objected to the immediate consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objected.

Mr. SCHENCK. Surely it cannot be possible that any member of this House has objected to considering a bill to provide for punishing the guerrillas who are committing such mischief and crimes, and murdering defenseless citizens and wounded soldiers in the rear of our armies. [Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the bill, and no debate is in order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I only want to be satisfied ["Order!"] and know if there is any gentleman on this floor who will object to a bill for such purposes. I therefore have asked the question. [Cries of "Order!" from the Democratic side, and confusion.] I want to know whose sympathies run in that direction. [Shouts of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects to the bill, and no debate is in order.

PERUVIAN CLAIMS.

Mr. STEVENS. I now renew the motion to go into committee for the purpose of considering the Peruvian claims bill, and move to postpone all prior special orders to enable the committee to consider that bill.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STILES moved that the House adjourn. The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now ask for a vote on my motion to go into committee.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of Senate bill No. 65, to provide for the payment of the claims of Peruvian citizens, under the convention between the United States and Peru of the 12th of January, 1863.

The bill was read. It declares that for the purpose of discharging the obligations of the United States, under the convention with Peru, of the 12th of January last, there be paid to Stephen G. Montano, or to his legal representatives, in the current money of the United States, the sum of $41,782 38, and to Juan del Carmen Vergel, or his legal representatives, the sum of $1,070, in the silver money of the United States, or its equivalent, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. COX. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the committee having, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly Senate bill No. 65, relative to Peruvian claims, had instructed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, and with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OREGON HOMESTEAD LAW.

On motion of Mr. McBRIDE, by unanimous consent, the Senate bill (No. 271) to amend an act of Congress making donations to settlers on the public land in Oregon, approved September 27, 1850, and the acts amendatory thereto, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PRINTING OF PACIFIC RAILROAD BILL.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, the bill which came from the Senate yesterday amending the Pacific railroad bill was ordered to be printed.

PUNISHMENT OF GUERRILLAS.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is it in order to move to suspend the rules to enable me to report a bill from the Committee on Military Affairs for the punishment of guerrillas?

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules is not in order except on Monday.

Mr. GARFIELD. I again ask the unanimous consent of the House for permission to report that bill; and I ask that it may be read for information.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. ANCONA. I object to the introduction of that bill.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, who objects?

Mr. SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. ANCONA.

Mr. ANCONA. I did object, and do not withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The bill, therefore, is not before the House.

Mr. FENTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided on the motion; and there were—ayes 77, noes 24.

Mr. PRICE demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs SMITH and BROOKS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twelve; a further count not being demanded.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was therefore agreed to; and the House (at fifty-five minutes past three o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 27, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. WADE. I move that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with. Nobody is listening to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The further reading of the Journal will be dispensed with, unless there be objection. The Chair hears none.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am requested to present the memorial of D. W. Whitney, of New York, praying that the expenses to which he has been subjected by his arrest and prosecution before a court-martial may be indemnified for. I move its reference to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Mrs. Fanny M. Smith, widow of the late General C. F. Smith, praying for compensation for the services of her late husband as a member of the military board for the settlement of the California war claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 244) to guaranty to certain States, whose governments have been usurped or overthrown, a republican form of government, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 411) to encourage immigration, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred various petitions and memorials praying for the enactment of suitable laws for the encouragement of immigration, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a resolution instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of placing the professors of ethics, of Spanish, and of drawing, at the Naval Academy, on the same footing with the other professors, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the subject having been enacted into a law.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 39) for the relief of Alexander Cross, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 81) amendatory of the joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports, approved April 29, 1864, to report it with an amendment. I should like very much to take it up for consideration, but I suppose I cannot ask for that at present.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will lead to debate.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 293) to empower the Superannuated Fund Society of the Maryland Annual Conference to hold property in the District of Columbia, and to take a devise under the will of the late William Doughty; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (No. 65) to provide for the payment of the claims of Peruvian citizens under the convention between the United States and Peru of the 12th of January, 1863; and

A bill (No. 248) in relation to franked matter.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution of the House (No. 63) to settle the account of James Keenan, late consul at Hong Kong, China.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 493) for the relief of William Brindle; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had yesterday approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (H. R. No. 15) to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana;

An act (H. R. No. 300) for the classification of the clerks to paymasters in the Navy, and graduating their pay; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 74) referring the claim of J. H. Clark & Co. to the Court of Claims.

VETO POWER IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. WADE. The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 285) to regulate the veto power in the Territory of Washington, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report it back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put the bill on its passage now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. WADE. I do not suppose it is necessary to read the original bill. The committee report a substitute for it, which will explain itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the reading of the original bill will be dispensed with.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That every bill which shall have passed the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory shall, before it become a law, be presented to the Governor. If he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that House it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the Governor within five days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Legislative Assembly by their adjournment prevents its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will inquire of the honorable Senator from Ohio what is the necessity for this measure. What is the present state of the law?

Mr. WADE. The Governor and all the executive officers of that Territory have sent a telegraphic dispatch here stating that it is very necessary. The Delegate from that Territory also says so. He says that a great many transient people get into the Legislature without much responsibility, and that they are burdening the people there with taxation, and he thinks the Gov-error should have this power to counteract their influence.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there no veto power there now?

Mr. WADE. None at all at present. This is an exact copy of the veto power prescribed in the Constitution of the United States for the President, with the exception that that gives the President ten days within which to return bills, and this bill gives the Governor but five, because the Legislative Assembly is limited in its time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

INDEX TO TAX BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask permission to lay upon the table, with a view to have printed, an index to the tax bill. I suppose it can be printed by to-morrow, and I think it will afford great convenience to gentlemen in the examination of the bill. It has been prepared by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I move that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WADE. If there be no more reports, I will ask the Senate to take up the joint resolution to amend the charter of the city of Washington.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Chair will now call for resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is entirely under the control of the Senate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, with the permission of the Senator from Ohio, I wish to offer a resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. If the rest of us cannot have the privilege of offering resolutions I shall object to it.

Mr. SUMNER. I presume the Senator can have every privilege that I can have. I certainly should not undertake to object to it.

Mr. DAVIS. Then will the Senator permit me to call up a resolution?

Mr. SUMNER. That is a different proposition.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I object to the Senator's resolution being received.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it cannot be entertained at this time.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution of inquiry:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish the Senate an account current between the United States and the Indian band of Wea, Peoria, Kaskaskia, and Piankeshaw Indians of Kansas, since date of their last treaty, (30th of May, 1854,) showing the amount and date of each remittance to said Indians under said treaty, and on what account each remittance was made; also showing the date of each investment of the proceeds of the lands of said Indians in State stocks, and amount of interest, if any, on said stocks, the date of investment, and the time during which interest was paid by the States respectively owing said stocks, and what balance, if any, is now in arrear and due said Indians either on account of interest on stocks or otherwise.

Resolved further, That a similar account be furnished between the United States and Western Missions of Kansas.

Mr. DAVIS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution cannot be considered today.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to call up a resolution that I offered on the 29th of March last.

Mr. GRIMES. There is a bill now before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, I ask that that resolution be now taken up.

Mr. WADE. I wish I could consent to that; but I do not think that sheuld have priority over a bill that there is a necessity for passing at once, and which is now before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I am willing to have the resolution acted upon without any debate.

Mr. WADE. That may be. I never offer one that I am not perfectly willing to have so acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the Senate postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the resolution indicated by him.

Mr. WADE. I hope not.

Mr. DAVIS. Is not that a debatable motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly, to a certain extent, not involving the merits of the question.

Mr. DAVIS. Exactly. I will ask for the reading of the resolution. It will take but a minute.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire and report to the Senate whether or not William Yocum, a citizen of the United States, late a resident of Cairo, or not confined in the penitentiary of New York, situated in Albany, or some other prison, by or under the sentence of a military court, for which the said William Yocum has received the full and unconditional pardon of the President of the United States; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers. And that the committee report to the Senate all of the facts in regard to the charges against said Yocum, and the proceedings in his trial, and all the facts in relation to such pretended pardon.

Mr. DAVIS. I will state a few facts why that resolution should now be taken up and acted upon. On the 4th of March last I presented a resolution in relation to the same matter, which I will now read, and which was passed by the Senate:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate a copy of the charge or charges, the sentence or judgment, the proofs, and all the papers and proceedings, including his pardon, connected with the case of William Yocum, of the State of Illinois, or of the State of Kentucky; and also if the said Yocum is now in prison, and if so, where, and for how long a time.

That resolution was passed upon on the 4th of March last. The President has not deigned to take any notice of it. On the 29th of March I offered the resolution now under consideration, which I will read:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire and report to the Senate whether or not William Yocum, a citizen of the United States, late a resident of Cairo, is or not confined in the penitentiary of New York, situated in Albany, or some other prison, by and under the sentence of a military court, for which the said William Yocum has received the full and unconditional pardon of the President of the United States; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

I called that resolution up on several mornings, and finally, on the 14th of April, the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. WILSON,] offered the following resolution, which was passed:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate the papers in the case of William Yocum, now confined in the penitentiary at Albany, New York, together with the record of the court before which the said Yocum was tried and sentenced to imprisonment.

Mr. WADE. I will inquire whether this proceeding is in order. If it is, it is perfectly certain that any Senator can prevent the doing of any business. The Senate have just determined to take up for consideration the joint resolution that I moved to take up. Now the Senator rises and moves that that be superseded by taking up a resolution, and proceeds to argue the question whether his resolution shall supersede it or not. If that is to be allowed another Senator can get up with another proposition and argue against him; and so it may go on. I cannot believe that that course of proceeding is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator state his point of order, whether it is to the entertaining of the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, or to the range of debate?

Mr. WADE. The range of debate. I hold that even if he can make such a motion he cannot debate it; but I will submit to the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the Senator is entitled to debate it and show the reasons why it should be taken up, but not to go into a general debate on the merits of the question.

Mr. DAVIS. So I was admonished by the Chair when I first rose, and so I will endeavor to restrict myself in what I say. I am going to state the reasons why this resolution should be taken up, and I will do it in as short a time as I can. I probably would not have occupied much more time than has already been consumed if I had not been interrupted.

I repeat, sir, that on the 14th of April the Senator from Massachusetts offered the following resolution; which passed the Senate without any objection:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate the papers in the case of William Yocum, now confined in the penitentiary at Albany, New York, together with the record of the court before which the said Yocum was tried and sentenced to imprisonment.

It will be seen that the point in my resolution is that Yocum has received a full and unconditional pardon for any offense, if he committed any, from the President, and that, in defiance of that pardon, he is now and has been since that time held in imprisonment. The resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts evades the true point in the case, and that is, whether there has been a pardon of William Yocum; and whether he is still kept in infamous confinement in defiance of that pardon.

Now, sir, on the 4th of March last a resolution, respectful in its terms, addressed to the President of the United States, was passed by the Senate, requesting him to give all the facts in relation to this case. Nearly three months have expired, and that resolution has not received any attention. Some six weeks afterwards, or nearly so, one of the friends of the President in this Chamber offered a resolution calling, not for the papers in relation to the pardon of the offense, if any was committed, by the President, but in relation to the sentence and charge originally. That was directed to the Secretary of War, and he has not answered it.

I have no doubt the fact is that Yocum committed no offense against the law. He was sentenced, nevertheless, by a court-martial to imprisonment, and the President of the United States, in the exercise of his constitutional power, granted him a full and unconditional pardon from the sentence and judgment of the court-martial. That pardon was placed in the hands of the Secretary of War. It was left in the hands of one of his principal subordinate officers, and in defiance of that pardon the Secretary of War still holds him in prison, and does not deign to answer the calls of the Senate in relation to the facts of the case. If that is not one of the most flagrant abuses of power that ever occurred in this or any other country I cannot comprehend the nature of the matter. I think it makes an imperative case in which the Senate ought to require the matter to be investigated by the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TRUMBULL (when his name was called) said: By unanimous consent I should like to say just one word. I intend to vote against taking up this resolution because it interferes with the matter now before the Senate, and interferes with the business of the Senate; but I do think that the respectful resolutions of the Senate should be answered by the officers of the Government, and on another occasion I should so vote. I now vote "nay."

The result was then announced—yeas 16, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Canfield, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Salisbury, Sherman, and Willey—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Morgan, Morrill, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Collamer, Conness, Doolittle, Harding, Henderson, Hicks, Howard, Howe, Nesmith, Pomroy, Riddle, Sprague, and Wright—14.

So the motion was not agreed to.

VOTING IN WASHINGTON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 57) to amend the charter of the city of Washington; the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. SUMNER to insert at the end of the resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That there shall be no exclusion of any person from the register on account of color.

Mr. SUMNER. I was interrupted yesterday by other business being called up while I was undertaking to reply to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.] I did not propose to make any extensive reply.

It is with pain that I differ from my friends. But with me there is no choice. Here is a measure which opens the whole question of suffrage in the national capital, and assumes the form of an amendment to the charter of the city of Washington. It provides that certain persons shall be registered, including even persons who cannot speak English, but in positive terms it continues and keeps alive the old rule founded on color. Now, sir, I cannot sanction any such rule directly or indirectly.

But it is said that in pressing my amendment the original proposition may be lost. This I shall regret much, very much; for I desire its passage sincerely. But I can see no reason why any discrimination of color should be made in the bill, or in our proceedings. If white persons are kept out of their rights, so are colored persons; and I would ask my friend from Ohio [Mr. WADE] which has been kept out the longest? I am for securing the rights of both, to the end that we may have at last in the national capital equality before the law.

We are shocked daily by the report of outrages upon colored persons. In Tennessee a colored woman has been murdered under the lash. Near Fortress Monroe another colored woman has been cruelly treated under the lash. This must be stopped. But I know no way so effective as to set an example of justice and humanity on our part. If we sanction slave-hunting, if we disregard the rights of colored persons, if we treat them as inferior in rights, why, sir, there are others who will follow our example, and add, also, a vindictive cruelty.

Therefore, in insisting upon the rights of colored persons here, I insist upon their rights everywhere. Nor do I see how I can abandon their rights here without abandoning them everywhere. We are Senators of the United States, bound to consider the whole country in all its extent, and to do nothing here which shall do mischief elsewhere. Especially are we held not to yield to any local pressure, or to any imagined local interests, and thus forget the cause of justice.

It is vain to say that this measure is temporary; for, in plain terms, it undertakes to amend the charter of Washington. It is vain to say, also, that there is another bill now on your Calendar which undertakes to regulate this whole question. Who can say that this bill will become a law? Ay, sir, who can say that, in the hurried hours of these closing days of the session, the bill will even be considered again? And yet on these grounds we are asked to abandon the present assertion of the rights of colored persons. But, if the bill in question can pass, when it confers these rights, so also can the present measure. If it be practical to assert these rights on one bill, it is equally practical to assert them on another bill, where such assertion is germane. It only remains that Senators should stand firm.

For myself, I will not sanction an injustice; nor will I miss any opportunity of asserting the rights of an oppressed race. I may be alone; but, to the extent of my powers, I mean to be right. Adopting again the language of General Grant, "I propose to fight it out on this line, if it take all summer."

Mr. CONNESS. I have no speech to make. I hope we shall come to a vote on this resolution, which has been pending so long, and dispose of it. The morning hour has been consumed now for three or four days in its consideration, and I am very anxious to call up another bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall vote against the amendment of my friend from Massachusetts; and, after the remarks he has made, I feel called upon to give the reasons why. This resolution comes from the Committee on the District of Columbia. It will be remembered that some four weeks ago the same committee reported a bill regulating the right of suffrage in this District, which is full and impartial. It does not make color an exclusion. It fixes the condition upon which the right of suffrage shall be exercised in this District entirely independent of color. It puts the right of the colored man to vote upon precisely the same conditions that it puts those of every other man. I suppose that bill to be entirely satisfactory to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. He has had the assurance of that committee that at the earliest practicable moment they intend to urge it upon the consideration of the Senate. It regulates the whole question of suffrage in this District. But that Senator knows as we all know that there are many things that are practicable here, and some things are impracticable. Some things may be done, and other things cannot be done; and no Senator knows better than the honorable Senator that this is precisely one of those things which at this moment cannot be done.

I disagree with the honorable Senator when he tells the Senate that this joint resolution covers the whole question of suffrage. I do not so understand it. It is simply a provision providing against frauds and to facilitate elections; and it is introduced with reference to the coming election that is to come off on the 1st of next month. It is only designed to be temporary in its effect upon this District. The committee believed that this was so simple a proposition that it would not divide the Senate; that this at least might be done; that nobody would object to it; that it was practicable to do this; and not waiving the purpose of the committee to urge the other question when the opportune time comes and it is practicable to do it, the committee deemed it their duty to do this. This much is practicable to be done; this much we can do; and we thought the Senate would not probably divide on it. The only practical question now for anybody to consider is whether we will do the thing which we can do, and which all admit ought to be done, or whether we shall fail to do that because we cannot, at this moment, do precisely what we desire to do, but what we know we cannot do. Now, as a question of practical statesmanship, I submit to my honorable friend whether it is not the part of wisdom to say we will do this now, and we will consider the other question when it comes up. I conceive that that is all there is in this question. For that reason I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the amendment by adding at the end of it, "and who have borne arms in the military service of the United States, and have been honorably discharged therefrom;" and the word "person," in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, should be changed to "persons" to make it congruous. I desire to record my vote on this amendment to the amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pennington, Ramsey, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Curdile, Cowan, Davis, Hendricks, McDougall, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Doolittle, Harding, Henderson, Hicks, Howard, Howe, Nesmith, Riddle, Sprague, and Wright—11.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. Is it in order now to move to amend the amendment as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. WILLEY. I move to strike out all after the word "provided" and insert:

However, That no such resident who is entitled to vote elsewhere shall be entitled or allowed to vote under and by virtue of this resolution.

Mr. WADE. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. I am not going to argue it, for there is not time for that.

Mr. WILLEY. I do not propose to go into the question of negro suffrage on this bill. It is sufficient for me to state that there is a bill amending the charter or proposing to amend the charter of the city of Washington in all respects, giving the city an entirely new charter, and which proposes to regulate the right of suffrage among other things. It is in the recollection of the Senate, too, that several Senators have laid on the table various amendments to that bill which have been ordered to be printed, so that when that bill comes up, which we are assured will in due time come, the whole matter can be considered, where it ought to be considered, in a bill amending the whole charter of the city of Washington.

Now, sir, it seems to me utterly incongruous and improper to be fighting on this little line all summer. Why, sir, it is the Senator from Massachusetts that is hanging on to the tail and the tip end of the tail of slavery whenever he can get hold of it. That bill will come up fairly and properly upon the bill in which it is proposed to amend the entire charter of the city of Washington.

The amendment which I have just offered is designed to meet a practical difficulty. For illustration: I did understand that the Secretary of the Treasury, during the last gubernatorial election in Ohio, took the advice of counsel whether he had a right to go home and vote in Ohio, and being advised that he had such right, did go home and vote. Now, shall the Secretary of the Treasury be allowed, having been a resident here for more than twelve months, to vote in the city of Washington? Also? How many are there in the same condition, and yet under this resolution as it now stands these transient passengers, temporary residents, will be allowed not only to cast votes at home in their own States, but also to vote in the city of Washington. It is with a view to meet that difficulty that I propose this amendment, as well as to get rid of the other difficulty and postpone the consideration of negro suffrage until that question comes up properly.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from West Virginia uses in his amendment the words "entitled to vote." Who is to determine whether these men are entitled to vote? The judges of election or each man for himself? If he would change his amendment so as to say that any man who has voted or offered to vote in any other place within the year preceding shall not be entitled to vote here, I would not object.

Mr. WILLEY. I have no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. But it leaves it open to the construction of every man that happens to be the judge of an election, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must call up the order of the day at this hour.

Mr. WILLEY. On reflection I will not accept the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, because there may be many men who have not offered to vote in the States that are still entitled to vote there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume the consideration of the order of the day.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the chairman of the Finance Committee and the gentleman having charge of this bill together, to cease the discussion on it and let us come to a vote. It consumes the morning hour day after day, and business of more consequence is kept back by it. Let us vote.

Mr. WADE. If we offered the ten commandments here, there would be a thousand propositions to amend, probably, and debates on them, and the final vote would be very uncertain. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNESS. So it will be as long as we debate. Let us have a vote.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the pending question? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The tax bill is now properly before the Senate, and the reading will proceed.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask that it be temporarily laid over to see if we can get a vote on this joint resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is another amendment to be offered, I see.

Mr. DAVIS. I have an amendment to offer to the preceding joint resolution. I do not propose to debate it, but I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I must insist on the regular order.

READMISSION OF REBEL STATES.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask leave to offer the following resolution. I do not wish it acted on now; I proposed to offer it half an hour ago, but it was then objected to:

Resolved, That a State pretending to secede from the Union and battling against the national Government to maintain this pretension must be regarded as a rebel State, subject to military occupation, and without title to representation on this floor until it has been readmitted by a vote of both Houses of Congress; and the Senate will decline to entertain any application from any such rebel State until after such vote of both Houses of Congress.

I wish to have it lie on the table to be referred to the committee to which we shall eventually refer the credentials of the claimant from Arkansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert the word "and" before "a," in the twelfth line of the one hundred and fifteenth section, and in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth lines of that section to strike out the words "and not exceeding $25,000; and a duty of ten per cent. on the excess over $25,000;" so as to make the section read:

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid annually upon the annual gains, profits, or income of every person residing in the United States, or of any citizen of the United States residing abroad, whether derived from any kind of property, rents, interest, dividends, salaries, or from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, carried on in the United States or elsewhere, or from any other source whatever, except as hereinafter mentioned, if such annual gains, profits, or income exceed the sum of $600, a duty of five per cent. on the excess over $600 and not exceeding $10,000; and a duty of seven and one half of one per cent. per annum on the excess over $10,000.

Mr. SUMNER. That is an important departure from the House bill, and I am free to say that I think it is a departure from correct principle; but then I know that that point has been the occasion of a good deal of discussion and in some quarters is regarded with disfavor. I do not mean myself to push any theoretical opinions on the question against what may seem to be the well-considered conclusions of our committee. I wish, therefore, to know whether on that point the committee were fixed in their opinions, whether they made up their mind deliberately to abandon the principle that an income tax should be graduated by an ascending ratio.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will see that it is not entirely abandoned; only one portion of it is stricken out.

Mr. SUMNER. The highest parts of the scale are struck out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The mode in which it was fixed in the former bill, if I recollect aright, was by imposing a tax of three per cent. on the excess of income over $600 and not exceeding $10,000, and five per cent. on all over $10,000. This bill makes the tax five per cent. on the excess over $600 and not exceeding $10,000, and seven and a half per cent. on the excess over $10,000; and then the House of Representatives added ten per cent. on the excess over $25,000, which we propose to strike out.

Mr. SUMNER. The idea of the House bill as I understand, was that the very large incomes ought to have a larger proportion of tax than the smaller incomes. On that point a great deal has been said, and the speculative writers on the subject differ very much, and indeed they differ somewhat according to the countries from which they are; the French writers, as I understand, being entirely agreed on the principle of the House bill, and the English writers agreed on the principle which would seem to be implied by the proposition of our committee in striking out this feature of the House bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will perceive that we retain the principle, but modify the details. The principle is retained in going up to seven and a half per cent. on incomes over $10,000. We have modified the details by omitting the clause which puts an additional rate on incomes over $25,000.

Mr. SUMNER. So I understand.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is all the difference that is made. I can only say that there was very considerable discussion in the committee on the subject. For myself individually, my own opinion is not exceedingly well fixed on this point. The income tax at best is a discrimination and a tax on property not often resorted to except in cases of emergency. I have no doubt about the propriety of our laying the income tax in the circumstances in which we find ourselves. I have been in favor of that from the beginning, and I have been in favor of making some discrimination as against large incomes. The bill of two years ago, if I recollect aright, first proposed to put a tax of three per cent. on all incomes over $600 and up to $10,000; five per cent. on all over $10,000 and up to $50,000; and upon the excess over $50,000 seven and a half per cent. The seven and a half per cent. provision was struck out by the Senate on the recommendation of the Finance Committee, and the rates were fixed as I have before stated.

We went on the same principle in this instance. There is an objection in the mind of many persons to making so very large a discrimination against property. The tendency of our free institutions, naturally perhaps, is to impose the heaviest burdens upon property; and yet there is and ought to be a sort of conservative sentiment to protect property. While in times of emergency especially we call upon it to pay largely, it is believed by many that it ought not to be unreasonably harshly burdened; because Senators will see, as the country sees, that the interests of the country and its wealth are wrapped up in property in a very great degree. It is for the interest of the community that men should be incited in every possible way to accumulate, because as much as they accumulate by their industry they add to the national wealth; that all should be encouraged to accumulate; and the prosperity of our country in a very great part is owing to the fact that our institutions leave the path of wealth, as of honor, open to all men, and encourage all men, whatever may be their situations in life and however they may start, to better their condition and to accumulate wealth, because the more they accumulate the more the nation has of wealth, as well as to seek the honors of the Republic by all proper means. For myself, I deem it but reasonable that every portion of the community should be made to understand not only that they are to be protected in their rights, but that no odious and ungenerous discrimination is to be made against the minority from the simple fact that it is convenient to lay your hands upon them.

For this reason, while we adopt the principle that those having very large incomes can afford, and perhaps better afford than those who have smaller ones, to pay a tax, and a larger tax, and the discriminating tax, if you please, there are limits even to that. All portions of the community, as I remarked before, should be made to understand that there is not to be against a class, because it is a smaller class and a prosperous class, an unreasonable and what might seem to them an unjust discrimination; and although we might put a few dollars into the Treasury—for there are not many of these large incomes in the country—by such means, yet the ill-feeling it would create, the establishment or the encouragement of the belief in the community that the Government may without stint lay its hands upon the property of the country without taking into consideration all those principles which I have stated, and which certainly are to the advantage of the community generally, would more than counterbalance what we should gain.

These in brief are the principles upon which the matter was discussed by the Committee on Finance, and which induced them, with entire unanimity, if I remember aright, to strike out the last clause of this provision, supposing that if the other House should insist upon retaining it our amendment would at any rate leave the whole subject open to further consideration by a committee of conference, and we thought that perhaps it needed further calm discussion before finally adopting a principle which is of so decided a character as this.

Mr. SUMNER. I am obliged to the Senator for his explanation, which is to me entirely satisfactory. My object has been accomplished in calling attention to the question. On grounds of principle, my own opinion would incline to the House proposition, I am free to say; but I understand that such a tax would probably produce comparatively little, and I am sure in certain quarters would be odious. I doubt therefore whether, however correct it may be on principle, it would be found to be very advantageous. On that ground I had made up my mind, unless something occurred which I had not anticipated, to follow the committee in their proposition of amendment. At the same time I thought that so important a change, on grounds of principle, ought not to be passed over in the Senate unnoticed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope this amendment of the Finance Committee will not be adopted. I very much prefer the bill as it came from the House of Representatives in this respect; and though I do not propose to argue the question, and am as anxious as the Senator who has this bill in charge, to progress with it and not delay it, I will take time briefly to state why I think there is no violation of principle in the sliding scale that is here adopted, and why it is eminently proper to impose this larger tax upon the larger income.

This is a bill to provide internal revenue, and it operates very unequally. It is not a bill to collect the tax out of the property of the country according to the property each individual has; but by the terms of this bill the poor man often pays as much tax as the rich man. He pays upon all the articles which he consumes. A man in this country worth $5,000, who is living comfortably and who has an income perhaps of six hundred or one thousand dollars a year, has as many mouths to feed, as many members in his family to clothe and to shoe and to furnish with all the necessaries of life, as the man who has an income of $500,000 a year; and he pays just as much tax on his sugar and his tea and his meats and everything which he buys. That is not equal; that is, it is not according to the property of the individual. To make this up to some extent we propose by this bill to put a tax upon income. The man who has an income of less than $600 a year is not taxed upon that income; and I am sorry to see that this bill, as it comes to us from the other House, proposes to increase the tax on the small incomes from three to five per cent. I would have left that as it was before, at three per cent.; but inasmuch as many provisions of this tax bill operate upon numbers, upon persons rather than upon property, and the revenue is collected in that way, I think it but right that we should impose a larger tax upon the large incomes. Where the income exceeds $25,000, and the individual who has that income and the vast amount of property from which it is derived, pays no larger tax under all other clauses of the bill than the man who has not five hundred dollars income, I think he may well afford to pay, and it is but just that he should pay, a higher rate of taxation upon this large amount of property which he possesses. It will be no more than equal then. I would even go further if I could have my way. I would not only have a tax of ten per cent. on the income exceeding $25,000, but when the income exceeds, say $100,000 a year, I would go even higher than that. I think that when the poor men of this country are giving their all to the defense of the country, when they are fighting to protect these millionaires who are receiving hundreds of thousands of dollars of income every year, whose property is protected by the poor men of the country to this vast extent, the millionaires can afford to pay liberally of their means; and I would tax every income exceeding $100,000 twenty per cent. I trust that this proposition to strike out the ten per cent. on incomes of $25,000 will not prevail.

As I said, I merely wished to make a statement to the Senate. I do not design to take up time in arguing the question. I ask, however, for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to say anything in regard to the pending amendment. I shall vote for it because I think that discriminations in the rates of duty are objectionable. They have been adopted in England only in regard to the smallest incomes. There, I believe, if the income is between £100 and £150, the rate of taxation is less than if the income is over £150. On all incomes above £150, which is $750 of our money, the rate of taxation is the same. The point to which I rise to call the attention of the Senate is, that this income tax will not apply to the current year; and I regret it very much. The time for assessing the income tax has passed under the old act, and the income tax payable in 1864 having accrued on the 1st of May, this bill will not affect it. There never was a time in the history of the country when an income tax could be paid so cheerfully as this year; and I wish to surgest to the serious consideration of Senators whether we cannot, this year, on the 1st of October next, or at some time that may be agreed upon, levy a war tax of say ten per cent. on all incomes without exception, or if any exception is made, excepting only the very smallest incomes. This course has been pursued in England several times; and I believe there never was a period in this country when a large income tax, made specially for this year and for war purposes, would be so readily and cheerfully paid as now. All persons who have sources of income, unless they are fixed incomes, have had their incomes very largely increased; and I believe they would now cheerfully pay an income tax of ten per cent. for this year. I do not intend to offer the proposition without the consent of the Committee on Finance, and I do not know whether they will assent to it; nor shall I press it upon the Senate unless I think it will obtain its sanction. I know that many members of the other House are in favor of assessing this large tax; the Secretary of the Treasury is in favor of it; and I believe if Senators will reflect on the circumstances by which we are surrounded, they will see that so heavy a tax as this could not only be readily collected this year, but would be assented to by all our people, and would strengthen the credit of the Government by showing that we are disposed to exercise our power of taxation to the utmost.

In regard to the pending amendment, I will simply say that all discriminations between rates of taxation on incomes tend to promote perjury and lead to abuse. I do not think that because a man is wealthy he ought to pay a higher rate of taxation. The effect of such a proposition is generally to induce a man to resort to subterfuges to decrease the apparent amount of his income, so as to avoid the payment of the tax. All taxes are paid more readily when people believe that they are paid equally by all classes of citizens. Because a man is very wealthy, I do not think a different rule of taxation should be applied to him any more than because he is poor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to understand the Senator from Ohio if he does not regard it as applying a different rule of taxation when the poor man pays just as high taxes on all articles he consumes under this bill as a rich man.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we could frame a system of taxation by which we taxed what the rich man consumes at a higher rate than what the poor man consumes, it might be then reasonable enough to consider the Senator's proposition.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If we cannot do that, we can approximate it by putting a higher tax on the additional income to some extent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is very onerous, and not defensible on principle.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire of the Senator if these distinctions are so odious, why have the committee recommended a distinction? We are to have one class of men taxed at five per cent. and another at seven and a half per cent., according to the report of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. We simply left in one discrimination. The House of Representatives inserted two and we have left in one. Perhaps it is not defensible; perhaps it is better to have but one rate of income tax. I think it would be better and wiser to have one rate, say ten per cent. if you please, placed on all income. In England they have several times levied two shillings on the pound and in some cases three shillings on the pound on income. Two shillings would be equivalent to ten per cent. and three shillings to fifteen per cent. We can pay a heavier income-tax than they ever paid in England, especially during the continuance of the war, when the inflation of paper money makes the payment much easier on our people. We have continued one inequality by leaving in the increase of two and a half per cent. above $10,000; I think that is enough.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment as recommended by the committee, and would have preferred it if it had included in the motion to strike out so much of the House bill as proposes any discrimination whatever in the rates of taxation upon incomes. I do not like and cannot approve the discrimination, the distinction in the rates of assessment or taxation upon incomes as proposed by the House bill. I cannot but regard it as wrong and indefensible in principle, and I think it will prove to be odious in practice. It is calculated to excite jealousy and dissatisfaction, and I apprehend that it will prove, upon experience, if it shall be suffered to stand, productive of harm, much more than of benefit, in its operation. I trust, therefore, that the amendment recommended by the Committee on Finance to the House bill will prevail, that this provision will be stricken out; and I hope further, that if this shall be stricken out, some member, when it shall be in order, will move to strike out that other provision of the House bill which imposes a tax of seven and a half per cent. upon incomes over $10,000.

Mr. President, the loyal and patriotic people of this country are not unwilling to be taxed; they expect to be taxed; and they will be content to be taxed to the utmost extent which the necessities of the country may require. They expect, however, as they have a right to expect, that these taxes shall be levied upon all classes alike, according to their several ability, and means to pay, without prejudice upon the one hand or favoritism upon the other, and in pursuance of some equitable and uniform rule of assessment. Discriminations of this kind, imposing a higher rate of taxation upon one class of persons than upon another, and that, too, upon the same subject-matter of taxation, can hardly fail to be received with disfavor, and to be a fruitful source of complaint and dissatisfaction. We all concede the importance of avoiding, so far forth as it is practicable to avoid it, in laying these taxes, all just ground or real cause of complaint. Taxes are regarded as a burden, though generally a necessary burden, upon the people; but when these burdens shall be distributed among all classes and all persons upon some just and equitable rule or rate of assessment, these burdens will be borne cheerfully and without complaint and without murmur by a patriotic and loyal people. Under a uniform rate of assessment, whether it be high or low, the burden of taxation falls equally upon all, according to their several means and ability to pay. Under such a rule the man of large estate, having a large income, pays a larger tax or impost than the man of less estate and less taxable income, just in the exact proportion that his assessed income is larger than that of the man of less estate. In this case the burden falls upon the two in the exact proportion to the relative amount of their respective incomes. We ought to ask no more and no less. In other words, and to illustrate, the man who has a taxable income, for instance, of $10,000 pays just ten times as much on that income as the man whose income is but $1,000. That is just and equitable, because both alike, in proportion to their respective means, contribute to the support of the Government; and there is no ground of complaint here, for both pay alike upon the same rate of taxation. Now, upon what principle of ethics or of equity would you impose a higher rate of taxation upon one of these parties than upon the other? I am unable to conceive of any. A departure from the old, and recognized, and established rule and practice in reference to the rates of assessment and taxation, in my judgment, will be alike unwise and impolitic. I am ready to vote for five per cent., as the bill proposes, or seven per cent. or even ten per cent. upon incomes; but let it be uniform; otherwise it is discriminating against one class, and that a small class, I am aware. I am content, for the present, to vote for the proposed amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I concur with the honorable member from Vermont that these discriminations are very impolitic, and are calculated to produce nothing but dissatisfaction; and I am by no means sure that we have a right to make the discrimination. In relation to direct taxes, or taxes upon specific property, I suppose it would hardly be maintained that we should have the power to tax one man's real estate specifically more than we tax the same kind of real estate in the hands of another; and if not, we cannot tax the real estate of a rich man specifically higher than we can tax the real estate of a poor man. So in relation to his personal property. The reason why in England, and why here, where income taxes have been resorted to, a certain extent of income, a minimum extent of income is exempted from the operation of the tax, is that it is supposed that that extent is necessary to maintain the man and his family, on the same principle that you exempt from taxation a pauper.

The policy of every country requires of course that no amount of taxation should be levied inconsistent with the ability of the citizen to support himself; and for the same reason all Governments have exempted from taxation that portion of property, whether real or personal, without which it supposes that the owner of it would not be able to maintain himself and his family. In England, in 1857, they did exempt from the income tax all incomes less than £100, and they did impose a discrimination in the tax upon incomes between £100 and £150, and the incomes which exceeded £150. In 1857 and in 1858 that was done, but the discrimination was not very great; and in 1859—I do not know how it is now—they taxed all alike, five pence in the pound, I think.

The honorable member from Illinois, and apparently there would seem to be some force in the suggestion, thinks that the rich man ought to pay more by a greater rate of tax upon his income than the poor man, because it is but right that he should contribute more to the support of the Government than the other. That is true; but that is done by this bill whether you discriminate between incomes or not. The rich man pays more because he is rich, and pays more just in proportion as he is rich; but the question now is not whether he is to pay more income tax because he is rich, but whether he is to pay a great deal more by increasing the rate by which you tax the income of the poor man. If you cannot distinguish between the poor and the rich in laying a specific tax upon real or personal property of any other description than the personal property of which income consists, what justice is there in discriminating between the income which one man may receive and which another man may receive? The view which seems to me to be demanded by proper policy, if not upon strictly legal grounds, is that you should make it what you please, but make it uniform.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I have already said that I am content for myself to leave this proposition on the recommendation of the Committee on Finance, and especially after the statement of the chairman of the committee. The consequence of the adoption of their recommendation would be as the chairman has suggested, that the subject would be still open in the conference committee between the two Houses; whereas should we reject their recommendation, the whole question is closed. Having that view, I should not have made another remark but for the principles that have been advanced by several Senators who have spoken. The Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Vermont, and also the Senator from Maryland, all seem to concur in condemnation of the House proposition as inequitable, as unjust. Now I am not prepared to go to that extent, and since that question has been distinctly stated I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some very authoritative words of one of the most remarkable writers who has discussed this subject. I mean Mr. Say, in his work on Political Economy. He treats this question somewhat at length, but, as I suggested some moments ago, the writers of France substantially adopt one view on this question, and the writers of England, with one great exception, another view. I ask the Senate to listen to what Mr. Say says:

"If it be desired to tax individual income in such manner as to press lighter, in proportion as that income approaches to the confines of bare necessity, taxation must not only be equitably apportioned, but must press on revenue with progressive gravity."

"In fact, supposing taxation to be exactly proportionate to individual income, a tax of ten per cent., for instance, a family possessed of 300,000*fr.* per annum would pay 30,000*fr.* in taxes, leaving a clear residue of 270,000*fr.* for the family expenditure. With such an expenditure the family could not only live in abundance, but could still enjoy a vast number of gratifications by no means essential to happiness. Whereas another family, with an income of 300*fr.* reduced by taxation to 270*fr.* per annum, would, with our present habits of life and ways of thinking, be stinted in the bare necessities of subsistence. Thus a tax merely proportionate to individual income would be far from equitable; and this is probably what Smith meant by declaring it reasonable that a rich man should contribute to the public expenses, not merely in proportion to the amount of his revenue, but even somewhat more. For my part, I have no hesitation in going further, and saying that taxation cannot be equitable unless its ratio is progressive."

Then in a note this same eminent writer adds, after quoting Smith's Wealth of Nations:

"It has been objected that a progressive scale of taxation presents the disadvantage of operating as a penalty to deter activity and frugality from the accumulation of capital. But it must be obvious that taxation of all kinds sub-tracts a portion only, and generally a very moderate portion, of the addition made to the fortune of an individual, so that every one has a much stronger inducement to invite than penalty to deter accumulation. If a person had to pay 2000 more in taxes upon every addition of 1,000 to his revenue, still he would multiply his enjoyments in a larger ratio than his sacrifices."

I have read these passages simply by way of giving the testimony of an eminent authority on this question when viewed in the light of principle, and I come back again to what I said at the beginning, that in our country at this moment, according to the best of my inquiries, the tax that is proposed by the House of Representatives and which our committee proposes to strike out would not be very productive, and I have reason to believe that it would be odious. I do not think that we shall accomplish enough by it to pay for what it will cost.

Mr. DAVIS. The first remarks of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts in relation to this subject indicated to my mind that he intended to vote against the amendment proposed by the committee and to adhere to the proposition of the House of Representatives. I received that enunciation of what I deemed to be his position with a good deal of pleasure. It is so seldom that that honorable Senator is right, that when he gets into that neighborhood it seems to me he ought to be a little more constant in sticking to it.

The honorable Senator's second speech was entirely against his first position. He has now come forward with a third speech and a most eminent authority that reasons the subject philosophically and with great force in favor of his first position and against the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance, and for an adherence to the proposition as it came from the other House. I was sorry to hear the honorable Senator say that he intended to vote against his speech and against the principles of his speech, and especially against the high authority from which he read.

It seems to my mind that the reasoning of that French author upon this subject is absolutely conclusive. In relation to taxes and the payment of debts something like this general principle is recognized in the system of all the States and the United States: that men shall pay according to their ability to pay; that a bare, stunted subsistence, that which is necessary to hold body and soul together, to use a homely but expressive phrase, shall not be taxed, nor shall it be charged with the payment of a debt, even in the form of execution or of attachment. Hence there is a modicum of property, I believe, in the systems of all the States, exempt from attachment and execution. The same principle of graduation is recognized in relation to taxes, and is, with general indistinctness, I think, acted upon in all the systems, whether State or national, that impose taxes; and it is that taxes shall be imposed according to the ability of men to pay.

The honorable Senator from Maryland says that this graduation of incomes for the purposes of taxation was recognized in England. It has been recognized in the legislation of Congress also. It was incorporated in the former bill, and in that bill incomes under $600 were not subject to be taxed at all, as they are not proposed to be taxed in the pending act. The former bill subjected incomes between $600 and $10,000 per annum, if I recollect aright, to three per cent., and I believe that that is enough tax to impose upon small incomes. Why are incomes under $600 all exempt from taxation? It is simply upon the ground of the absolute necessity of those incomes for the subsistence of the father of a family and the members of the family. Does not that recognize the principle against which gentlemen debate, that taxes upon incomes shall not be arithmetically equal? That is not the principle of legislation on the subject, but the principal is a general, vague recognition of the idea that taxes shall be paid according to the ability of persons to pay.

Now, sir, which is most able to pay—an income between $600 and $10,000, five per cent., or an excess of income above $25,000 to pay a rate of ten per cent.? Every man's income to the amount of $600 is exempt. In that point of view the provision is equal and uniform upon all income. Incomes between $600 and $10,000 are by this bill subject to a tax of five per cent. A duty of seven and a half per cent. is proposed by the House of Representatives on the excess over $10,000 and not exceeding $25,000, and a duty of ten per cent.

on the excess over $25,000. The effect of the amendment of the Committee on Finance is to exempt incomes above $25,000 from the increased taxation. It is apparent to every one that $25,000 is as much as any man ought to require for his annual support as a general rule; that any income above $25,000 is in excess and redundant, and that there is no necessity and no just and wise political economy that ought to operate upon Congress to induce it to protect by its legislation in war times the excess of income in any man's case above $25,000.

The honorable Senator from Illinois placed the subject in another aspect that struck me forcibly. He said truly that the poor men do the fighting in the war. Will any gentleman point to me a single millionaire or a man in the United States whose income is above $25,000 that has gone to the field?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can point the Senator to one, and who fell in the field; and that is General Wadsworth.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; and he went into the field with two epaulets on his shoulders.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senator will pardon me. I know men who went in as privates and who served as privates who were worth over a million dollars.

Mr. DAVIS. They were eminently praiseworthy; but I imagine the number is very few.

Mr. FOSTER. Because there are very few who have that amount of money.

Mr. DAVIS. They are exceptional cases.

Mr. HOWE. As my friend is in quest of information, and I am devoted to the educational interest, let me tell him an instance. The Paymaster General informed me—I think it was about two years ago, when our finances were a little reduced—that a private from the State of Connecticut called in and lent the Government forty odd thousand dollars to pay some arrearages.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That, I suppose, is the same case that was mentioned by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know.

Mr. FOSTER. Not the one.

Mr. DAVIS. There are miracles in this time of national trouble and of war, but they are very few. The idea that millionaires and men whose incomes exceed $25,000 as a general rule go into the camp is not supposable. There may be some exceptional cases; but if they go into camp at all it is not by shouldering the musket, unless in very rare cases. They do not send their sons there as a general rule unless the sons go with epaulets upon their shoulders.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is very much mistaken. In New England a great many of the sons of the richest men have gone in as privates.

Mr. DAVIS. All honorable praise to them. Such men as those do not want $25,000 and upwards of income exempted from the three additional per cent. of taxation.

Mr. CONNESS. Will my friend permit me to state—

Mr. DAVIS. I have called up, I believe, the whole bee-hive. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNESS. Will my friend permit me to state another case where a distinguished citizen, and I have no doubt a man of great fortune, went into the battle-field, as has been stated positively to me, with a musket on his shoulder—the case of Hon. Garrett Davis of Kentucky? [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I went in without asking a dollar of pay.

Mr. CONNESS. Deserving the more honor for that.

Mr. DAVIS. If the gentlemen will give me an income of $25,000, they shall not only have ten per cent. upon the excess above $25,000 but the whole of it. [Laughter.]

The gentlemen who have such enormous estates and whose estates and personal rights are protected by the Government and by its continuance, in this time of war ought not to grudge a tax on the excess above an annual income of $25,000 to go to save the life of the nation, over which we have heard so many lucubrations.

No, Mr. President, my principle has always been, and is now, that all that is due from a man in the payment of debts, and especially in the payment of taxes for the protection which his Government gives to him and to his property, ought to be assessed upon the general principle of ability to pay. He that owns most is most able to pay. He that owns most is most largely protected. He that has an income above $25,000 is infinitely more able to pay than the man who has an income of from six hundred to a thousand dollars. The one might part with all that excess without any injustice to his family, without any injustice to himself, and the other is taxed when the tax is a charge upon the actual comforts and wants of those whom it is his duty to maintain and support. I hope myself that the amendment offered by the Committee on Finance will not be adopted. I think, on the contrary, that there ought to be a proposition to strike out "five" and restore the tax of "three" per cent. upon incomes between $600 and $10,000.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harris, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wiley—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Carlile, Conness, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Hadian, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nye, Ramsey, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wilson—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Dixon, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Hicks, McDougall, Richardson, Tilden, Saulsbury, and Wright—12.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the next amendment of the committee, in section one hundred and fifteen, line twenty-three, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That only one deduction of $600 shall be made from the aggregate incomes of all the members of any one family composed of parent and minor children, or husband and wife, except in cases where such separate income shall be derived from the separate and individual gains or labors of the wife or child; and the deduction in such cases made shall be allowed only upon the income of the head of family.

And to insert:

And provided further, That net profits realized by sales of property upon investments made within the year, for which income is estimated, shall be chargeable as income; and losses on sales of property purchased within the year, for which income is estimated, shall be deducted from the income of such year.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for a division of the question. I desire to have a separate vote on striking out the proviso in the bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) Then the question will be on striking out that proviso.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that proviso will not be stricken out. It was intended to prevent frauds that were perpetrated under the old act; and I think if Senators will read it they will agree that it should be retained. The object was to prevent the head of a family from dividing up his income among his wife and children, and thus covering his whole income by the exemption. I was not present in the Committee on Finance when the proviso was stricken out, but I am informed by the chairman of the committee that it was deemed better to strike it out because there was no reason for making the discrimination. I think I can see a very obvious reason. The purpose of the exemption of $600 is to provide enough of food and the absolute necessities of life for the head of a family free from taxation; but where the different members of a family have each separate property all derived from the same source, I do not see why the same exemption should extend to all of them. If the wife has a separate and independent property, she is entitled to the deduction of $600 under the language of the proviso as it now reads; and where the property of the child is derived from the labor of the child he is entitled to the exemption of $600. But suppose the income of the child is derived by inheritance, not from his labor or even by a gift from the father; why should the exception be made in favor of that child who is actually supporting the father? I am told that under the old law there were many cases where the heads of families scattered their property among their children and thus made the exception of $600 to cover an income of $6,000. The purpose of the proviso as it stands is to prevent that abuse.

Mr. WILSON. I shall vote against striking out this proviso if we are to retain this exemption. I am against this $600 exemption. I regard the whole thing as a cover under which the great mass of the income of the country protects itself from taxation. I believe two thirds of the incomes of the country are under $600. Men who own property worth thousands of dollars get exempted under it wholly and entirely. I intend to move, when the proper time comes, to tax all incomes under $600 or $1,000 three per cent. I think the ratio adopted here based on sound principles, and I shall vote against striking out this proviso on that ground.

This bill, as it now stands to-day, will exempt nearly all the farmers of the country from paying any income tax. The most independent portion of the community in this country are exempted from paying any tax at all under this bill. No man can be more independent than the man who has got a good farm well stocked, and an income of less than $600 after supporting his family. If the exemption was confined to persons who had no property and exempted the mere product of their labor necessary to support their families, that would be a fair consideration; but as it stands to-day two thirds of all the incomes in this country are exempted under the provisions of this bill. I believe great frauds are perpetrated under this exemption as it now stands; that wealthy persons divide their property among their wives and children, and thus get exempted from tax under this $600 clause. I am opposed, however, to striking out this proviso if that exemption clause is to be retained.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have nothing to say in regard to that matter. If the exemption would apply to independent farmers I think they ought not to be excepted. Where it applies to a man's manual labor I think he ought not to be taxed.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator if he does not believe that under that exemption whole farming townships in the country will not pay a farthing of revenue?

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe so. They will cover it up. I will state to the Senate that the most fruitful source of revenue in England, where the income tax is reduced to a system, is the small incomes between £100 and £150. That class of incomes yield an aggregate to the British Government greater than any other class of incomes. The amount of revenue derived from incomes between £100 and £150 in England in 1857 was £682,229.

Mr. GRIMES. Do they tax incomes below £100?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; but only in a certain class of cases. The amount of revenue derived in the year 1857 in England from incomes under £100 a year was only £66,336. They exempt all incomes derived from manual labor, I understand, but they tax all other incomes below £100. No other classification of income there above £150 yields anything like as much as that between £100 and £150. The nearest approach to it is the class of incomes between £200 and £300, where the difference is £100 instead of £50, which yielded in 1857 £516,576. I have no doubt, therefore, that if you could remove this exception of $600, if it is possible to do so without injustice, you would probably increase your income tax more than in any other way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to make a word of explanation. The Chair has entertained this as a separate and distinct proposition simply to strike out the first proviso which has been read. If, however, the intent of the committee was to strike out and insert, that is a separate and distinct proposition and is indivisible, and it is not in the province of the Chair to allow a division of the question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The committee did not intend it as one amendment. It is plain and clear as it is. The trouble is that the clerks where they find one amendment to insert and another to strike out make them parts of one amendment, and thus mingle together two subjects which are totally distinct. I hope they will not trouble us in that way when they come to arrange the amendments to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question then will be on striking out the proviso commencing in the twenty-third line of the one hundred and fifteenth section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are totally distinct things. In the report that was made by the committee one amendment was to strike out these words and the next amendment to insert others. They are distinct in their nature, and intended to be so. I hope when the clerks come to fix this bill they will not undertake to accommodate themselves in drafting it, but will put it just as the committee have reported it. Otherwise they will make a great deal of difficulty.

Now, sir, the question whether the $600 exemption shall be stricken out of the bill or not is one totally distinct from this particular clause, and has nothing to do with it except this: that if that is stricken out this would follow as a matter of course. The reason why the committee thought it best to strike out this proviso was that it is so indeterminate. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue was before the committee, and suggested as an alteration that the words "or child" should be stricken out, leaving it to apply to the wife alone; that it was difficult to execute and would be found attended with a great deal of difficulty in practice, and in fact lead to frauds. The idea was not to prevent frauds, as supposed by the honorable Senator from Ohio; and perhaps, had he been with us at the time this clause was under discussion he might have been convinced by the long discussion and examination that took place before the committee in relation to it. It will be noticed that the concluding clause of the proviso is in these words:

And the deduction in such cases made shall be allowed only upon the income of the head of family.

• Suppose the head of a family has no property, but his wife has an income: the result will be that no deduction is allowed. There are numerous cases of that description. Suppose the head of a family has no income and his child has: then the child would get no deduction, because it is to be made in all cases on the income of the head of the family. The Senator on reexamining the provision will see that he has not examined it with minuteness and care.

Mr. SHERMAN. That might be obviated by saying that it should be deducted from the highest income.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That might be very difficult to ascertain. Those cases might occur very frequently. But take the case of the child; suppose the child has an income and the father has an income also. The father nevertheless has to support the child and pay his expenses. He is not exempted from the obligation that is upon him to support his child until he attains his majority. The obligation, therefore, is that the property of the child accumulates and there is to be no benefit to the parent derived from it. He must pay the expenses of the child without any income, comparatively, and without any deduction, so far as he is concerned.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, by the laws of Ohio we provide for that very case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We are not legislating for Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know, but I am speaking of the general principles of the law. We provide that where the child has property and the parent none, the courts may make an allowance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That might be where the child has property and the parent has none; but suppose the parent has property.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then he is bound to support the child.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly he is bound to support the child, and the deduction is made from his property and not from the child's. So it is with the wife. He is bound to support the wife. She may have property and he may have property. The same rule would hold precisely. He must pay all the expenses, and he derives no benefit so far as the law is concerned. With regard to minor children he could not do it because he is bound to account for everything.

There were so many innate difficulties about the clause itself and its execution that on consideration and examination the committee came to the conclusion to strike it all out. There may be cases of fraud possibly arising from this exemption, but they cannot be very numerous. They may arise under every clause of this bill. You cannot prevent them in all cases. If the assessors are vigilant, watchful, and careful in the execution of the law they will undoubtedly prevent the most of them. They can look into these things and see how the matter is. They have power to put men under oath, and in all cases they must render their accounts under oath, as we have amended the bill, in all cases, and explain the whole matter from beginning to end. They are subject to examination and cross-examination; they must testify; they must answer questions; and if the assessors do their duty they can in most cases get at the real state of the facts with regard to it.

Looking at the whole clause as it stood and the difficulties that were about it in the view of the Commissioner himself and the difficulties that we, as a committee, had on examining it, in attempting to reduce it to a shape that would make it effective and operative without producing injustice, the committee came to the conclusion on the whole that it was best to leave the statute as it stood originally and strike out this clause. If the Senate shall be of a different opinion it is all the same to the committee. The committee on full examination had no doubt that it should be stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on inserting the following words at the end of section one hundred and fifteen:

And provided further, That net profits realized by sales of property upon investments made within the year, for which income is estimated, shall be chargeable as income; and losses on sales of property purchased within the year, for which income is estimated, shall be deducted from the income of such year.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Perhaps I ought to make an explanation of that particular clause. There is a good deal of difficulty about it. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] called my attention to it. It was first started in the House of Representatives.

That amendment originated in the fact that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has ruled that where a man bought an estate, for instance, land, no matter at what distance of time, say twenty years ago, for a given sum, and held it for the twenty years and sold it in any given year, say for instance this year, he must account for, as income of the year, making all due allowance for taxes, interest, &c., the amount that he sold it for over and above what he gave for it originally.

Mr. JOHNSON. Although he had not received it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If he sold it; that is to say, if the honorable Senator from Maryland invested a certain portion of his property in real estate twenty years ago and held it until this year, and this year sold it at an advance, all the increase in price, making these deductions, must be considered as income for this year. The thing itself was manifestly wrong, because it is capital, and it is capital as it accumulates from year to year.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has it been so construed under the old law?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was the construction the Commissioner put upon it in writing. Our difficulty was to fix any ratio of income. If anything could be considered as income in such case, it is the increase of value for the year. If, for instance, you buy property one year and hold it, and by last year's accumulation on it it became so much more valuable, that might be considered as income when you sold it; but how could you tell very readily what that was? The committee, therefore, in considering the question and looking into the difficulties that surrounded it, came to the conclusion that the only mode in which it could be arranged—and it should certainly be fixed in some way—was to provide that if a person sells property of any sort within the year, you may estimate the increased value, what he made upon the transaction, as income; but certainly it should not apply to purchases existing before we ever thought of passing an income tax or internal revenue tax. We fixed it in that way, coming to the conclusion that that was the only reasonable mode in which to fix it, and trusting that if the House differed with us in opinion they would enable us to establish some other rule that would be better than ours.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and sixteen, line six; after the word "income" to strike out the words "has been," and to insert "is or should be;" in line ten, to strike out the words "as an officer," and to insert "for services;" in line thirteen, to strike out the word "sum," and to insert "rate," and after the word "dollars" to insert the words "per annum;" in line fifteen, after the word "any," to strike out the words, "bank, trust company, savings institution, insurance, railroad, canal, turnpike, canal navigation, or slackwater," and to insert, "corporation or joint stock;" in line nineteen, to strike out the word "railroad," and insert "corporation or joint stock;" in line twenty, to strike out the word "be," and to insert "have been," and after the word "and" to insert the words, "the tax;" and in line twenty, after the word "said," to strike out the words, "banks, trust companies, savings institutions, insurance, railroad, canal, turnpike, canal navigation, or slackwater," and insert "corporation or joint stock;" so that it will read:

Sec. 116. And be it further enacted, That in estimating the annual gains, profits, or income of any person, all other national, State, and municipal taxes other than income lawfully assessed within the year upon the property or sources of income of any person, as aforesaid, from which said annual gains, profits, or income is or should be derived, shall be deducted, in addition to $600, from the gains, profits, or income of the person who has actually paid the same; whether owner, tenant, or mortgagor; also the salary or pay received for services in the civil, military, naval, or other service of the United States, including Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, above the rate of $600 per annum; and there also shall be deducted the income derived from dividends on shares in the capital stock of any corporation or joint stock company, and the interest on any bonds or other evidences of indebtedness of any corporation or joint stock company, which shall have been assessed and paid by said corporations or joint stock companies, as hereinafter provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and sixteen, line twenty-five, after the word "family" to strike out the words "not exceeding $200. The annual rental value," and to insert "and the rental value;" in line twenty-seven, after the word "homestead," to strike out the words "in excess of $200;" in line twenty-nine, after the word "shall," to insert the word "not;" and in line thirty, after the word "person," to strike out the words "for each year;" so that the clause will read:

Also the amount paid by any person for the rent of the homestead used or occupied by himself or his family, and the rental value of any homestead used or occupied by any person or by his family, in his own right or in the right of his wife, shall not be included and assessed as part of the income of such person.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I feel bound to explain an amendment of that importance to the Senate and the views which the committee had in relation to it. It makes an important change of the House bill. According to the old law every man was allowed his homestead; that is to say, its rental value was not to be considered as income if he owned it; if he hired the house, the amount which he paid for rent was to be allowed. The committee of the House, however, in framing this bill adopted a new rule; and that was to allow $200 to each person for that purpose and make him account for the residue. The matter occasioned very considerable discussion in the Committee on Finance, and the committee came to the conclusion that it was impossible to carry out that provision without making a very odious discrimination especially between town and country. Inasmuch as it depended upon the rent, it would have no sort of connection with the cost of a man's house originally but merely upon the rental value, and the rental value would depend in a very great degree upon the place where it happened to be located. Thus it would be impossible to make it equal in any way. It would impose a burden upon certain men who happened to live in a city, from which men living in the country where rents are low, comparatively nothing, would be exempted entirely. The committee thought the safer and better principle would be to allow every man, as the old law did, the rental value of his house, whether he owned it himself or in right of his wife or anybody else, or rented it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and sixteen, line forty-six, after the word "year" to insert the following:

And all companies, whether incorporated or partnership, other than the companies specified in section one hundred and nineteen of this act, shall pay the tax on income herein provided on all gains and profits, whether divided or otherwise.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of section one hundred and sixteen the following proviso:

Provided, That in cases where the salary or other compensation paid to any person in the employment or service of the United States shall not exceed the rate of $600 per annum, or shall be by fees, or uncertain or irregular in amount or in the time during which the same shall have accrued or been earned, such salary or other compensation shall be included in estimating the annual gains, profits, or income of the person to whom the same shall have been paid, in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe; and in all cases where such salary or other compensation shall have been heretofore omitted from the list or return of the annual gains, profits, or income of the person receiving the same, and no income tax has been deducted or withheld therefrom, it shall be competent for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under like direction, to cause the list or return thereof to be made and the income tax thereon to be assessed and collected in the same manner and to the same extent as if the salary or other income so received had been properly listed and returned for taxation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the sixty-fifth line the word "the" should be inserted before the word "amount," so as to read, "uncertain or irregular in the amount."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That word will be inserted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see any member of the Committee on Finance present except the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS], and I do not know whether he remembers it; but I am inclined to believe that the last clause of that amendment was not agreed to by the committee; at any rate it never was agreed to by me, I know. I objected to it at the time. The Senate will notice that this amendment provides where an uncertain salary or fees paid do not amount to $600 of themselves, they shall be taken into consideration with the other income of the present year if the whole amount to more than $600, so that the person may be charged upon the excess. That is all right. That is an amendment suggested by the Commissioner in order to cover certain cases which ought to be covered. The last clause, commencing after the word "prescribe" in the seventy-first line authorizes the Commissioner to look up the cases of the last year and have the like proceedings with regard to them. That is a principle which if brought to my attention at the time I should not have agreed to. It reads in this way:

And in all cases where such salary or other compensation shall have been heretofore omitted from the list or return of the annual gains, profit, or income of the person receiving the same, and no income tax has been deducted or withheld therefrom, it shall be competent for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under like direction, to cause the list or return thereof to be made and the income tax thereon to be assessed and collected in the same manner and to the same extent as if the salary or other income so received had been properly listed and returned for taxation.

If we omitted certain things in the law of last year by which certain persons escaped taxation, I do not think we are now authorized to go back and insist that the Commissioner shall have the right to say what should have been the tax last year, and attach it to this provision. I think the principle is a bad one.

Mr. JOHNSON. Was the omission an omission of the law itself?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir; the omission was in the law itself. This amendment is intended to remedy that omission in the future. I will therefore take the liberty—I suppose the Senator from California, who is the only member of the committee present, will agree to it—to move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "prescribe" in the seventy-first line, in the words that I have just read.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to. The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and seventeen, line nineteen, to strike out the word "general" before the word "provisions," and in line thirty-eight to strike out the words "as aforesaid."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and nineteen, line seven, after the word "inland" to insert the words "insurance company, either;" and in line eight, after the word "mutual," to strike out the words "insurance company;" so that it will read:

Sec. 119. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied and collected a duty of five per cent. on all dividends in scrip or money thereafter declared due, and whenever the same shall be payable, to stockholders, policy-holders, or depositors, as part of the earnings, income, or gains of any bank, trust company, savings institution, and of any fire, marine, life, inland insurance company, either stock or mutual, under whatever name or style known or called, in the United States, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and nineteen, after the following proviso—

Provided, That the duty upon the dividends of life insurance companies shall not be deemed due or to be collected until such dividends shall be payable by such companies—

To add the following words:

Nor shall the portion of premiums returned by mutual life insurance companies to their policy-holders be considered as dividends or profits under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and twenty-one, line forty-three, to strike out the word "general" before the word "provisions."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and twenty-three, line six, after the word "passing" to strike out the words "from any person who may die," and in line seven, after the word "act" to insert the words "from any person;" so that it will read:

Sec. 123. And be it further enacted, That any person or persons having in charge or trust, as administrators, executors, or trustees, any legacies or distributive shares arising from personal property, where the whole amount of such personal property, as aforesaid, shall exceed the sum of $1,000 in actual value passing after the passage of this act from any person possessed of such property, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and twenty-three, line twenty, after the word "at" to strike out the words "and after."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that there are several propositions of amendment of this kind in this section, mere verbal corrections, striking out the words "and after," and those amendments will be regarded as agreed to, if there be no objection, without any further formal notice.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and twenty-four, line six, to strike out the word "paying" and insert "payment;" in line seven to strike out the words "distributing any portion thereof;" and inserting the word "distribution;" and in line fifteen to strike out the word "property" and insert "legacy or distributive share."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and forty-two, line three, to strike out the word "successor" and insert "succession."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and forty-six, line three, to strike out the word "their" and to insert the word "his;" and in line seventeen to strike out the word "or" after the word "assessor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and forty-eight, line four, before the word "assistant" to strike out the words "assessor or;" so that it will read:

Sec. 148. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any party, liable to pay duty in respect of his succession, who shall be dissatisfied with the assessment of the assistant assessor, within thirty days after the date of such assessment, to appeal to the assessor, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and fifty, line one, after the word "that" to insert "all laws in force at the time of the passage of this act in relation to stamp duties shall continue in force until the 1st day of July, 1864, and;" in line four to strike out the words "the 1st day of July, 1864," and to insert the words "that day;" and in line twelve, after the word "for" to insert "whom or for;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 150. And be it further enacted, That all laws in force at the time of the passage of this act in relation to stamp duties shall continue in force until the 1st day of July, 1864, and on and after that day there shall be levied, collected, and paid for and in respect of the several instruments, matters, and things mentioned and described in the schedule (marked B) herewith annexed, or for or in respect of the vellum, parchment, or paper upon which such instruments, matters, or things, or any of them, shall be written or printed, by any person or persons, or party who shall make, sign, or issue the same, or for whom or for whose use or benefit the same shall be made, signed, or issued, the several duties or sums of money set down in figures against the same, respectively, or otherwise specified or set forth in the said schedule.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and fifty-one, line three, to strike out the words "the proper" and to insert the word "a," and after the word "stamp" insert "or stamps of the proper amount;" and in line six, after the word "stamp," to insert "or stamps to the proper amount;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 151. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful to record any instrument, document, or paper required by law to be stamped, unless a stamp or stamps of the proper amount shall have been affixed; and the record of any such instrument, upon which the proper stamp or stamps aforesaid shall not have been affixed, shall be utterly void, and shall not be used in evidence.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not see myself how we are to make this law with reference to stamps harmonize with the existing laws of the States. We say in this section that it shall not be lawful to record an instrument, or document, or paper unless it is stamped, and yet this recording is done under the laws of the States, and the recorder is required to record all instruments presented to him. He is liable to heavy penalties if he does not do so, and it is not his fault if the stamp is not affixed to the instrument. I do not see precisely how this statute is going to be in harmony with the existing laws of the States; nor do I see how we can protect the rights of third parties under it. Suppose a man in one of our States (and our State laws are alike in this respect) writes to another and asks him to ascertain whether the title to a certain piece of land he wants to buy is in the man proposing to sell it. That person goes to the recorder's office and finds that it is; it so stands on the record; but no man can tell whether those deeds were stamped or not. In that way an innocent purchaser of land may be defrauded of his title entirely. While I cannot suggest exactly the proper amendment, I can see some difficulties that may arise under this section, though I do not know how they can be remedied. I do not see how we can say that a man who is required to record a deed shall not record it unless there is a stamp attached to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is aware that within the constitutional limits the laws of the United States are supreme, and they control State laws. Therefore the supreme obligation may be imposed upon an officer of the State so far as a record is concerned. But there is no real effect given to the word "lawful" in the second line of the amendment beyond that which follows in the next sentence which says the record shall be invalid.

Mr. POMEROY. I want to ask the Senator, if I should prosecute a recording officer in my State for refusing to record a deed without a stamp being affixed according to the provisions of this act, could he plead this statute in court?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see why he could not if we had the right to pass the law, because the laws of the United States are paramount in all cases.

Mr. POMEROY. That is the very question, whether we have the right to pass the law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That I have no doubt about. We have a right to impose excise duties, and of course we have all the incidental rights to see that the laws imposing those duties are obeyed and carried into execution.

Mr. POMEROY. The point I suggest is, whether we have the right to say to an officer of a State that he shall not record an instrument without this stamp.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly; just as much right as we have to say that the citizen of any State shall not do a thing, and the law of the State obliging him to do it would not excuse him.

Mr. POMEROY. The States had some rights before the rebellion. I do not know whether they have any now or not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They never had that right, to make their laws supreme over the laws of the United States.

Mr. POMEROY. But did the United States ever have the power to make its laws supreme over the law of the State if the State law was not in contravention of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is in contravention of a law passed under the Constitution of the United States, and that is the same thing; if it comes in conflict with it it must yield. The only effect, I take it, however, of using that expression is found in the next sentence, which says that the record shall be invalid and of no effect. I do not see that there is any doubt about it myself.

Mr. JOHNSON. What page is that on?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is on the 202d and 203d pages, and I should like to have the opinion of the honorable Senator from Maryland on that section.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I do not feel disposed, as the bill is in Committee of the Whole, to make any point on this matter. It can be alluded to now, and a motion made in regard to it in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I cannot myself understand this proposition. I do not see where the power of Congress is to interfere with an internal matter of State regulation respecting the recording of titles to lands. But I do not mean to stop the progress of the bill now by discussing it. I have had some conversation with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] on the subject, and I think he proposes to make some amendment, but he is not now in his seat.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This amendment can be adopted, and any amendment necessary to perfect it can be suggested hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has already been adopted.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and fifty-four, line twenty-three, to strike out the word "any" where it occurs the second time, and to strike out the words "got off" and insert "remove;" in line twenty-four to strike out the words "got off" and insert the word "removed;" and in line thirty to insert the word "any" before the word "stamped."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and fifty-five, line four, after the word "thereupon" to insert the words "the initials of his name and;" so that the clause will read:

Sec. 155. And be it further enacted, That in any and all cases where an adhesive stamp shall be used for denoting any duty imposed by this act, except as hereinafter provided, the person using or affixing the same shall write thereupon the initials of his name and the date upon which the same shall be attached or used, so that the same may not again be used.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I think there ought to be some way of erasing or destroying these stamps entirely different from the arrangement under the existing law, and from what is proposed in this bill. I notice that the Postmaster General, in a report that he made, stated that the amount of postage stamps that had been redeemed that had been used a second time amounted to very many thousand dollars, simply because men have manufactured some chemical process by which they can take off the ink mark, and leave the stamp as perfect as it was before. In our large bank corporations, where notes are paid every day, there is a large amount of paid notes with these stamps affixed; the stamps are not destroyed, and they could be used again if they would only erase the ink. That any chemist can do with little or no trouble. It occurred to me that if the committee could frame an amendment by which the stamp should be destroyed more effectually, punched or effaced in some way, so that it could not be used again by a process of that kind, it would prevent a great many of them being used a second time. It would at least prevent a great temptation which is certainly held out in some of our banking institutions, where the clerks have access to a large amount of paid notes, the stamps on which have never been effaced except by writing the initials of a name across them and putting the date on them. Whenever the ink is taken off, those stamps can be used a second time; they are not counterfeit; and the imposition can be practiced upon anybody.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will inquire of my friend if he has anything to propose.

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir, I have an amendment which I thought I should propose to this section requiring the stamp to be punched. I will prepare an amendment that the stamp shall be so entirely destroyed that it cannot be used again.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is very easily said. The question is, how is it to be done?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and fifty-five, line eleven, after the word "provided" to strike out the word "nevertheless;" and in line seventeen to insert the words "made under the direction and to be;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That any proprietor or proprietors of proprietary articles, or articles subject to stamp duty under schedule C of this act, shall have the privilege of furnishing, without expense to the United States, in suitable form, to be approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his or their own dies or designs for stamps to be used thereon, to be made under the direction and to be retained in the possession of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for his or their separate use, which shall not be duplicated to any other person.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of section one hundred and fifty-seven the following:

And such instrument, document, or paper, bill, draft, order, or note, shall be deemed invalid and of no effect.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not like that amendment proposed by the committee. It proposes to declare every instrument of writing which requires a stamp to be absolutely null and void if it has not that stamp affixed. I do not think that should be the case. The purpose of the section is to secure revenue, and it seems to me there is abundant guard by imposing in the body of the section as it came from the House a penalty on the party who makes an instrument requiring a stamp without affixing the same, and also a penalty upon the party who shall receive, accept, or pay such an instrument that requires a stamp. I would not insist that the instrument should be valid until stamped; but if the parties by carelessness or inadvertence should neglect to stamp the instrument, which in my own professional observation very often occurs, the interest of the Government in securing a revenue is equally promoted by allowing them to stamp it afterwards, and let the instrument then be a valid one. I propose to amend the amendment by adding these words, "until duly stamped, which may be done by the holder if the party making the same refuse so to do;" so that the amendment, if amended, will read:

And such instrument, document, or paper, bill, draft, order, or note shall be deemed invalid and of no effect until duly stamped, which may be done by the holder if the party making the same refuse so to do.

The Government secures her revenue, but does not defeat what was intended perhaps to be a fair contract between the parties. It seems to me the chairman will not object to this amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If that amendment should be adopted I should regard the stamp act as of very little value. The House of Representatives left out this clause, which the committee propose to insert. There was very little discussion about it, and there is not usually much opportunity for discussion given in the House of Representatives upon these bills. Two years ago we had a provision of the same kind. The provision was considered in committees of both branches, and it was considered at length in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, and after deliberation adopted. It has been found to be productive of no injury, for the reason that Congress is always ready to prevent any essential injury arising under it. In the first place, we extended the time for the act to go into operation for many months so far as that particular clause was concerned, and we have now inserted a clause in a subsequent part of this bill by which we provide that no instrument heretofore executed without a stamp shall be invalid; and it may be that we shall have to do the same thing again in order to prevent difficulties.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will allow me, since I proposed my amendment my attention has been called by a member of the Committee on Finance to a proviso to section one hundred and sixty-two, which, if it is not changed as proposed by the committee, would perhaps accomplish what I think ought to be secured:

Provided, That no instrument, document, or paper made, signed, or issued prior or subsequent to the passage of this act without being duly stamped, or having thereon an adhesive stamp to denote the duty imposed thereon, shall, for that cause, if the stamp or stamps required shall be subsequently affixed, be deemed invalid and of no effect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The committee propose to strike out the words "or subsequent" in that proviso.

Mr. HENDRICKS. So I observe, and it presents the same question which I now raise.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me explain it. It is all part of the same subject-matter.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was going to say that inasmuch as the judgment of the Senate on this very question may be reached when we come to that proviso, I am willing to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I may just as well explain it now. We may as well meet the matter in one place as in another; because if you leave in those words "or subsequent" in that proviso, you will effect the same thing.

This amendment was inserted on very great consideration, and it was done by the light of the experience of England on the subject. No penalties that you impose will protect the revenue with reference to stamp duties. In the first place, it is nobody's interest to enforce them, and it is impossible almost to enforce the great multitude of them that would occur. You must therefore have some sharp, short, and decisive argument to apply to every man to induce him not to attempt to defraud the revenue in this way. The Senator supposes he might reach it by providing that the instrument shall not be used until it has been stamped; but I should like to ask him what proportion of the instruments upon which you provide here for a stamp duty ever come into a court of justice? Not one, I suppose, in a million, and the question, therefore, would not arise. Take the infinity of bank checks that are drawn, and it is very seldom that you ever hear of one of them in a court of justice. The same is true of notes and great numbers of papers of different descriptions. Once in a while you have a litigation upon one, and upon that you get your stamp duty; but what would become of the nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand? Many of them perhaps would be stamped; but you hold out nothing but a penalty which it is not anybody's interest to look up and enforce; and thousands and thousands of men probably would pay no sort of attention to the law requiring a stamp, especially when they find that there was another provision in the law that if they are compelled to appear in a court of justice they can then put on their stamp.

The result of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana would be that you would materially lessen the revenue from stamps. I do not believe you would get one half the revenue that you otherwise would from that source, such would become the looseness of practice under the law. Great Britain tried it and found that everything in the shape of penalty utterly failed; that the only way was to render the instrument invalid unless it had the stamp.

When we passed a similar law two years ago, the same argument was raised, the same fears were entertained. In practice there has been found to be no difficulty, for the simple reason that up to the present time we have provided against all such troubles in the first place by putting the time for the law to go into execution far ahead, and we have relieved it here by making all instruments good, or rather declaring that none of them shall be invalid for the want of a stamp, up to some time after the passage of this act; I think up to the 1st day of July.

That saves all this. All you want and all you ever wanted in regard to it is to give abundance of time to have the law properly understood by the community; and then if men choose to omit it they may take the consequences or we may from time to time remedy it. But if we take away this fear which hangs over men in regard to their instruments, in my judgment the stamp duties will not produce one half of what they would produce under other circumstances. Men are very careful now when they take papers to look after the stamp. The man who gives a paper has to stamp it himself, and it is the interest of the individual who receives it in the ordinary course of business to see that the stamp is on the paper when he takes it. By adding this provision rendering the instrument invalid in case it is not stamped, we have an additional inducement to vigilance on the part of the person who takes the paper to see that it is properly stamped. The mere fear of the penalty which now exists has no great effect. Senators can understand very well how men, if the thing was suffered to pass by, might not put on stamps. If that was done and the paper were circulated in the community, how many men do you suppose would be prosecuted to recover the fifty dollars or the $100 penalty? Probably not one in a thousand. I am so well satisfied of it that I really should almost feel inclined to abandon the stamp duty entirely unless this provision be made.

Mr. COLLAMER. I believe this to be the first attempt under this Government to render these papers void for want of a stamp. I am safe in saying that this is the first time it has ever been attempted to render deeds of conveyance void for the want of a stamp. We have in each of our States a system of registry of title—

Mr. FESSENDEN. We made them void by the act of two years ago for want of the stamp.

Mr. COLLAMER. When I say that this is the first time we have attempted it, I mean that during this war is the first time. I have heard much of it since we passed the law of two years ago. It gave me much trouble at that time, and it has given me much more since. I was about remarking that our system of registering titles in this country has been regarded as of very great value. It is to be observed that under this provision if in the line of a man's title there is a deed which happens to be without a stamp, his title is gone. Suppose I own a piece of land, that I purchase it and receive for it a deed duly stamped. The record shows the regular line of deeds from the original proprietor of the land down to my grantor. I see that he has a title of record. If I am to be subject to be defeated of my title by its being shown that one of the deeds in the line was without a stamp, our registry system is good for nothing. I see that the other House has put in this bill a provision that a deed shall not be recorded unless it is stamped. That is no security. Our Supreme Court have decided over and over again that any law of Congress directing the duty of a State officer is void.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will my friend answer whether the Supreme Court has ever decided that a law of Congress prohibiting a State officer from doing a certain thing is void?

Mr. COLLAMER. The court has said that he is under no obligation to regard your law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That he is not under obligation to do an act that Congress orders; but that is a very different question from saying that he has a right to do an act which Congress prohibits. That has never been decided.

Mr. COLLAMER. This provision of the law is totally without sanction; there is no penalty if the officer does record the deed without a stamp being on it. The State law compels him to record a deed if it is authenticated agreeably to the laws of the State. The law of one State, for instance, requires that it shall be a sealed instrument; that it shall be acknowledged; that it shall be witnessed by two witnesses. When whatever the State makes necessary for the authentication of the paper has been complied with, and it is presented to the register to be recorded, he is obliged to record it under very severe penalties imposed by the State law. There is nothing in this bill which attempts to interfere with that, or proposes to punish the officer if he records a deed not stamped. The provision here, then, furnishes no security.

Besides, the provision being that it shall not be recorded without a stamp, the effect is at once to raise the presumption that if a deed is recorded it is stamped, while the fact may be entirely otherwise; and a man is therefore subjected to the hazard of having it shown by parole testimony that his deed was not stamped; and though it is recorded, which would imply that it was stamped, because the law says that if not stamped it shall not be recorded, yet on its being shown in point of fact that it was not stamped, his title is gone.

The truth is that the undertaking to put into operation this idea of producing an effect upon third persons by unstamped papers will not do. I say nothing now about the topic of which the Senator has spoken, in regard to which I do not entirely agree with him, in relation to negotiable paper; but in regard to matters which affect third persons, the question is entirely different. The Senator says that if a note is given by one man to another, you want to make it as much the interest of him who gives as of him who takes the note to have it stamped. I will say nothing now about the great injustice and inequality of a provision which declares that if I take a note of $100 un-stamped I shall lose it, and that if my neighbor takes one for $10,000 without a stamp he shall lose the whole $10,000. The thing is perfectly monstrous. But there is this saving clause about that; it is a man's own fault; he sees the paper and he can see whether it is stamped or not; he is not obliged to take it without a stamp; and there the thing is confined in its operation to the parties to the paper. But when you come to deeds of conveyance of land, it is entirely a different thing; they relate to the interests of persons who are not parties to the deed. Nor will it do to say that you will give a man the right to come into court afterwards, when a subsequent owner gets into a dispute about the ownership of the land, and he wishes to show his title, to stamp the deeds then. He cannot get them to stamp. It is entirely a different affair in this country from England, where the title deeds may pass with the sale and the purchaser holds them and can see what they are. We do not do that here. All we do when we undertake to show a man's title to a piece of land by the record, is to produce office copies from the record duly certified. As to getting all the deeds in the line of title all the way through into court for the purpose of stamping them, the thing is utterly impossible.

Nor can an example of this kind be drawn from Great Britain, where a totally different state of things exists. Indeed, it is not true that deeds are there declared void for want of a stamp. I am convinced of the utter impracticability of getting along with a provision declaring deeds inoperative and void unless they are stamped. Such a policy cannot be adapted to our registry system so as to preserve that system as having any value. It so appears to me, and I have prepared some amendments with a view to that which will perhaps satisfy the chairman of the committee. I cannot but say that I very much doubt the expediency of declaring any of these papers void for want of a stamp.

We have had in this country two or three different stamp acts. Our first stamp act was in 1797. Notes were required by that act to be stamped, but were not declared void without a stamp; but it was enacted that they should not be given in evidence until they were stamped. That I believe is the English law. That act did not include deeds of land. It provided for stamping paper, vellum, &c., for certain instruments, and forbade under penalties any person writing such an instrument on unstamped paper. Paper was stamped for the different kinds of instruments.

Afterwards there was a provision as to bills payable abroad not stamped. They were not declared void, but a heavy penalty was put upon passing them. Subsequently an act was passed that allowed those instruments to be stamped that had not been stamped. Upon paying ten dollars to the collector he would stamp them, which ten dollars went to the United States; and there was a subsequent law also extending the time of getting them stamped.

In 1813 we had another stamp act, and it was confined to notes discounted in the banks; and the banks, instead of buying stamped paper were allowed to commute at one half per cent. on their annual dividends, which they did. None of those papers were declared void for want of a stamp; but it was provided that they should not be given in evidence or be available in court until they were stamped; but by paying the stamp duty and two dollars to the collector, he gave his receipt upon the paper, and that was a good stamp. That was the way the law stood.

There was nothing in those laws which extended to the case of deeds of conveyance of land; and it seems to me that the difficulty which arises in relation to our registry system cannot possibly be avoided unless some amendment is made. I think the penalty imposed by declaring the paper void is so exceedingly unequal that it does not commend itself to our acceptance. The Senator tells us that it is now proposed that in the case of all instruments heretofore executed the parties may go and get them stamped, or may stamp them in court, and that we may hereafter pass laws from time to time to help the holders of unstamped instruments. Is not that a very questionable power? If I give a note without a stamp that is void, and that the law declares to be void—the law not merely saying that it cannot be given in evidence but that it is absolutely void—and a man holds that note for two or three years, and then comes to Congress and gets a law by which he may stamp it and make it good, is not that a very questionable sort of legislation? If it was a void note under the law of the land when it was made and delivered, I do not see how it can grow good without the man's consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Vermont a question. Suppose it was a deed in a chain of title the validity of which had been tested in court and the real estate recovered on the ground that the title was defective in consequence of a deed having had no stamp upon it, what would be the effect then of your coming in with a law afterwards declaring the deed valid?

Mr. COLLAMER. I fancy, Mr. President, that there is a great deal of difference between papers made between the parties, and affecting them only, and those affecting the interests of third persons. Take the case of a man who lends me a sum of money and takes my note for $100 unstamped. By and by he wants his money from me. He has got my note. I tell him it is unstamped and good for nothing. Then he says, "I want the money I lent you," and he can prove that he lent me the money for the note. If he sues me for money loaned and advanced by him, I might perhaps show that I gave him a note for it, and that might be a defense to such a general action; but suppose he comes into court and says, "Yes, you gave me the note, but it is good for nothing, it is void by the law, and now I want the money that I lent you," I ask the Senator from Illinois whether he doubts the power to recover that; does he not believe that could be recovered?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose it could be recovered as a debt.

Mr. COLLAMER. But now take the case of land. I contract for a piece of land, and I pay for it, perhaps, in other property—I may have paid for it in other land—and the man gives me a deed which is not stamped. Can I recover that land of him? Most clearly I cannot. There was no legal conveyance of it; I never got it. There is clearly a great deal of difference between the two cases. The great point I have on my mind relates to our undertaking to make a deed of land void in relation to third parties. That relates to the conveyance of property, which property remains in existence and continues on and passes down in the course of title. It seems to me that in relation to that, at least, it ought to be protected from being declared void. I find that in the statutes of Congress to which I have referred, notes which were not stamped were not declared void, but they were inoperative as evidence in court until they were stamped. I think there ought to be no objection at least to an amendment going to this extent:

That the title of a purchaser of land by a deed duly stamped shall not be defeated or affected by the want of a proper stamp on any deed conveying the said land by any person from or under whom he claims or holds title.

Mr. JOHNSON. The effect of that is to secure one stamp.

Mr. COLLAMER. I say the man must get his own deed stamped, but other deeds are not affected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not certain that I shall object to that amendment hereafter, after I have looked at it, if the Senator will let us go on with the amendments of the committee.

Mr. COLLAMER. I had intended to withhold all remark on this question during this reading of the bill; but several gentlemen around me said to me that this topic of which I had spoken to them was up, and that I ought to express my views about it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am very glad that the Senator has given his views; but we are now acting as in Committee of the Whole, and I think it is as well to adopt the amendments of the Committee on Finance; and then if other amendments are not made so as to make the provision satisfactory to gentlemen, we can strike out the committee amendments when we get into the Senate.

Mr. COLLAMER. I did not mean to interrupt the bill on my own account.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am glad to hear the Senator's views on the subject. I want to make it as perfect as we possibly can.

Mr. CLARK. I feel that the subject is one of some difficulty, and I am very glad that the Senator from Vermont has made the remarks he has made; but I hope that where the amendments of the committee do not contravene any amendment or notion of his, he will allow us to go on with our amendments, and then the whole thing will be open again. We can be instructed as we go on by getting the views of different Senators. I have felt that the matter has been a difficult one from the beginning, and I have not been satisfied with it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before proceeding further I move that at half past four o'clock to-day the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. RAMSEY. Let us take it at four o'clock.

Mr. CLARK. I think that if we go on half an hour longer now and make a little progress, with the time we shall have in the evening, we shall get through with the reading of the bill to-night.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There will be before the reading of the bill is finished some very important questions, and Senators of course know that a night session cannot be very full.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My view is to get through to-night with the reading of the bill and the amendments proposed by the committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Almost the last amendment proposed by the committee is to strike out a section of the House bill in relation to the tax upon liquors on hand, and I desire to have a vote on that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If that shall be found to lead to great debate, it can be passed over when we reach it. I do not propose to stay here a great while this evening, because my strength will not allow me to remain very long after being at work all day, but I think we might get through to-night with reading the bill and general amendments.

Mr. CLARK. If we shall get through all the amendments but the one referred to by the Senator from Indiana, we shall do very well, and we can reserve that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My motion is, that at half past four o'clock to-day the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

The motion was a recedo.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I like the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont well enough as far as it goes, but I do not think it covers this subject at all, and I ask that the amendment as I have modified it since I proposed it be now read to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the committee will be read again.

The Secretary read it. It was to insert after the amendment of the committee:

Until duly stamped, which may be done by any holder or party interested therein, if the party making the same refuses or is unable to do it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If all the cases where a stamp is not put upon a paper as required by the law were cases of fraud between the parties, the idea of the Senator from Maine would be entitled to great consideration by the Senate; but I think that a case of that kind would not occur where a hundred cases of the omission of the stamp by mere neglect without any fraudulent purpose would occur. If the Senator wishes to provide against a combination between parties to leave the stamp off with the view of the discharge of the paper without a stamp, a case of fraud, I am willing that such a provision be made. If the party making the paper and the party receiving it, by collusion and for the purpose of defrauding the Government in its revenue, leave the stamp off, then I am willing that such a paper in the hands of the payee, if you please, shall be void, but not in the hands of an innocent purchaser.

My own observation for the last year or two, since the passage of the stamp law, leads me to know that there are thousands of cases in the country in which parties neglect, by mere mistake, by want of having their attention called to it, to put the necessary stamp upon the paper. I know bankers will never neglect it; I know merchants will never neglect it where their attention is called to it every day; but I do know that the farming community will forget it in one half the cases. I do not think that where I have had occasion myself to draw a check upon a bank within the last year I have thought of putting a stamp upon it in one half the cases. Of course the banker would always call my attention to it, and he put the stamp upon it himself; but suppose the person receiving that paper from me without any fraudulent purpose on my part, a mere oversight, a forgetfulness, if you please, has the paper in his hands representing $1,000 or $10,000, and I choose afterward to say to him, "This shall be considered as a void document," shall the law come in and enable me to perpetrate such a wrong upon him? There is no necessity for it. The interest of the country does not require it, the interest of the Government does not require it, in my judgment. For some years in the State of Indiana we had a law declaring all usurious contracts void. It was tried for a while. Penalties were found insufficient to stop usury, and then the Legislature thought by declaring the contract itself void between the parties and between all holders of the instrument it would eradicate the evil; but after trying it for a few years our Legislature abandoned it, and merely visited upon the parties a penalty, and we have had no serious complaint on the subject since.

I think this is a similar case. If the stamp is not upon the paper punish the man if he has intentionally left it off, punish the man who discharges the contract if he has discharged it with the view of defrauding the revenue; but certainly do not inflict upon a party who holds the paper innocently so great a loss as the entire benefit of the contract; it may be $10,000. He may be innocent. The person who makes the bill of exchange or promissory note may intend to evade the law; but the person receiving it may receive it in good faith, honestly, and then you punish the one by a small penalty who really intended to defraud the revenue, whose duty it was to put the stamp upon it, and you punish the other by the loss of his money, perhaps $1,000 or $10,000. I cannot support such legislation or a bill with such a feature in it. My amendment I think is right. We may as well test it by the yeas and nays, I suppose, and I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARK. It seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from Indiana completely nullifies the amendment of the committee, and perhaps that is the design of the Senator. I think an amendment of that kind would go a great way to do away with the care that ought to be exercised in executing these instruments. For instance, I execute a note to some Senator. The Senator takes it without regard to any stamp upon it, because he knows if there is not a stamp upon it by and by when he finds he wants the stamp he can get me to put one on, and if I do not he can put it on himself. The result would be, in my judgment, that in a million of cases, almost, there would be no stamp on these papers because the man has nothing to do but put it on when the stress comes, and he can run his chance of that coming.

Mr. TRUMBULL. He will be subject to a penalty, will he not?

Mr. CLARK. It is very true there is a penalty; but the question is whether the penalty is sufficient, whether the man will not say to himself, "If I give this note nobody will know; nobody will know if I take it." If the payee refuses to pay it, then perhaps the man who took it will hunt him up and get his penalty; but there ought to be some more stringent provision than that. I submit to the Senator if he has not forgotten himself to put on stamps.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly; I said so. On one half the checks I have given since the passage of the law I have forgotten to put on a stamp.

Mr. CLARK. Then the penalty did not quicken his memory.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Was there any penalty before?

Mr. CLARK. A penalty was imposed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would not want the man that took my check to lose the money he was entitled to because I forgot to put on a stamp.

Mr. CLARK. Quite true. Even by the forfeiture of the paper a man's memory is not quickened sufficient to put the stamp on. The Senator from Indiana is not singular. I was exactly in that same condition myself; and being in the habit of drawing checks, I told the cashier to put a stamp on all my checks that reached the bank without one.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And after you had passed that to a third person in the payment of a debt you owed him, what right under this law would the cashier in the bank have to put a stamp on it? It is a complete instrument in the hands of the man you hand it to.

Mr. CLARK. I generally went and took or sent it by somebody to get the money for myself; but a very serious question arises, whether when you have given away a void instrument and it has gone into the hands of other parties and it then comes into the hands of some person who puts a stamp on it, you can then renew it and make it good as the Senator proposes. There is a difficulty about the matter, and I suggest that the Senator perhaps had better let it go until we get through with the whole provision in regard to the stamps, and see whether in connection with the other matter mentioned by the Senator from Vermont and this matter we shall not get some plan which may be satisfactory. I do not think the penalty is sufficient, and I feel that the penalty imposed by the avoiding of the instrument in some cases would be very hard.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire, as he is on the committee, whether he would not favor a proposition of this sort: that where an instrument is drawn between two parties, they fraudulently combining to defraud the Government of its revenue by the omission of a stamp, that instrument never can be made good as between themselves or any persons taking it with notice. I am willing to go that far.

Mr. CLARK. It seems to me the difficulty in that case would be to prove that those two persons designed to defraud. But we shall have an opportunity of thinking of this whole matter; and without adopting this amendment to the committee's amendment, we can leave the subject in such a shape that we can come to it again if we are not entirely satisfied with it when the bill gets into the Senate. I desire only to have the provision made perfect. I confess I am not entirely satisfied with it myself, and never have been.

Mr. HENDRICKS. At the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire I am willing to pass over the amendment I have suggested and also the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance. Let the whole matter stand over until we consider it fully.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest to the Senator that even if the amendment of the committee be adopted it will still remain open.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I know that; but I want to leave the door wide open if it is to be open at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will not do to go through and leave so many things unfixed in committee. The Senator can move to strike out this amendment in the Senate, if he desires to do so, although we adopt it now in committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understood that the chairman of the Committee on Finance was willing to let both amendments be passed over.

Mr. CLARK. The chairman did not express a willingness to let the amendment be passed without some vote upon it, for fear it might escape.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then we might as well meet it now, perhaps.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bucknow, Carille, Collamer, Davis, Dixon, Foster, Hendricks, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Fessenden, Foot, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wade, and Wilson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Doolittle, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Hicks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Wilkinson, and Wright—13.

So the amendment of Mr. HENDRICKS to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twelve of section one hundred and fifty-eight to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to make the clause read:

If any person shall pay or negotiate, or offer in payment, or receive or take in payment, any such draft or order, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit the sum of $200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and fifty-nine, to strike out the following clause:

No conveyance, deed, mortgage, or writing, whereby any lands, tenements, realty, or other property shall be sold, granted, assigned, or otherwise conveyed, or shall be made as security for the payment of any sum of money, shall be required to pay a stamp duty of more than the sum of $1,000, anything to the contrary notwithstanding; and.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twelve of section one hundred and fifty-nine, to strike out "or" and insert "of."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

The next amendment was in line twenty-four of section one hundred and fifty-nine, to strike out "is" and insert "shall be;" so as to make the clause read:

And whenever any bond or note shall be secured by a mortgage, but one stamp duty shall be required to be placed on such papers: Provided, That the stamp duty placed thereon shall be the highest rate required for said instruments, or either of them.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to make a little amendment in the one hundred and fifty-ninth section which I think nobody will object to. It is a section containing the exceptions of papers that need not be stamped. After enumerating the various instruments which are required to be stamped, the schedule of stamp duties provides that all other contracts not herein mentioned shall have a certain stamp. I fancy that there will be very little question that an indorsement of a note is a contract. Clearly it is a contract; and in order to prevent the requirement of a stamp to every indorsement made on a note, I desire, in the nineteenth line of section one hundred and fifty-nine, after the word "nor" to insert the words "to any indorsement of a negotiable instrument or."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont whether he means to include all cases of indorsement with a view to assigning a legal instrument in writing. If so, I want to suggest to him that according to the laws of some of the States, and among them the State which I in part represent, all contracts in writing are assignable by indorsement thereon, and I suppose it is the purpose of the Senator to include them in his amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. We regard nothing as negotiable in my part of the country except notes and bills.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In the State of Indiana, and other western States, not only bills of exchange and promissory notes, but all instruments between parties are assignable.

Mr. SHERMAN. The word "negotiable" is never applied to anything but a bill. In our State a sealed bill is assignable by indorsement.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not want to go to the extent of covering all assignments. Assignments of a mortgage require a separate instrument, and are provided for.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no trouble about it, because it will be seen, on looking at the list of stamp duties, that assignments are left out entirely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DAVIS. Do I understand the chairman of the Committee on Finance to say that assignments are to be stamped?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; only assignments of a mortgage, a lease, or a policy of insurance, they being the only assignments mentioned in schedule B.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time having arrived at which the order of the Senate requires a recess to be taken, the Senate will now take a recess until seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

PETITION.

Mr. DIXON presented a petition of manufacturers and others, citizens of Hartford, Connecticut, praying for the enactment of suitable laws for the encouragement of immigration; which was ordered to lie on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The House of Representatives has sent to us the bill (H. R. No. 198) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, with a request for a second committee of conference. I move that the request be granted.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore was, by unanimous consent, authorized to appoint the committee; and Messrs. Howe, Morrill, and Buckalew, were appointed.

SOLOMON WADSWORTH.

Mr. HENDRICKS. A few years ago an act was passed for the relief of Solomon Wadsworth, allowing him to enter about one hundred and thirty or one hundred and forty acres of land on his paying for it, but in the act there was a mistake in the description of the land. The Committee on Public Lands instructed me a few days since to report a bill correcting that mistake. I ask that that bill may be taken up and passed so as to secure his title during the present session, as it has yet to go to the House of Representatives. There is no trouble about it; it will merely take the time that will be required to read the bill. I now move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 288) to amend an act for the relief of Solomon Wadsworth, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the act for the relief of Solomon Wadsworth, approved June 16, 1860, so as to read as follows:

That the title of Solomon Wadsworth, of Clayton county, in the State of Iowa, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to lots Nos. 2 and 3, in section No. 15, in township thirty-five north, of range three west, containing one hundred and thirty-four and eighty-four hundredths of an acre in said State of Iowa, and that a patent issue therefor in accordance with the laws of the United States, upon the payment of $1 25 per acre therefor into the proper land office of the United States: Provided, That if the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall find that the said land has already been paid for, and a certificate of entry or location has issued for the same, he shall issue the patent upon such certificate to the assignee thereof.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up the bill amending the enabling act of Colorado.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall not object if there will be no talk about it.

Mr. WADE. That I will not warrant you; but if there shall be debate I will consent to drop it at once. There is no occasion for talk about it.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 291) to amend an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that so much of the fifth section of the act to which this is an amendment as provides by ordinance for submitting the constitution to the people of the State of Colorado for their ratification or rejection, at an election to be held on the second Tuesday of October, shall be so amended as to read, "on the second Tuesday in September, and that the election shall be held on that day."

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. McDougall. I move to take from the table the resolution offered by me to discharge the Committee on Foreign Relations from the further consideration of the joint resolution of the House of Representatives, which was referred to them in regard to Mexican affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON. The chairman of that committee is not here.

Mr. McDougall. I have sought here day after day in the morning hour to have a simple resolution passed discharging the committee from the consideration of this subject. If they do not choose to act upon it, I should like to have them discharged, so that it can come before the Senate. I have sought repeatedly during the morning hour to call up the question, and now I am here in my place and I ask to have the committee discharged, so that the joint resolution can lie on the table. I do not want it considered now; I simply want to bring it before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The motion is that the Senate now take up for consideration the resolution referred to by the Senator from California, which is to discharge the Committee on Foreign Relations from the further consideration of the joint resolution of the House of Representatives in regard to Mexican affairs.

Mr. CLARK. It seems to me that should not be done now. When the Senate took a recess the tax bill was under consideration, and undoubtedly Senators expected that it would be resumed immediately on the Senate's coming together again, and that may be the reason why the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations is not in his place. I hope no other subject will be taken up, but that the regular order of business will be proceeded with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the bill under consideration at the time the Senate took its recess is still before the Senate, and that the matter which has been taken up has been so taken up by common consent of the Senate. The Chair thinks that any discussion of a subject which is not before the Senate, unless by common consent, is out of order.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The Senate have power to take up this resolution by a majority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question to the Senate if it is requested; but the Chair cannot entertain discussion on the subject without common consent.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not desire to engage in discussion upon it. I have sought to bring this question before the Senate, but have not been able to obtain the floor in the morning hour, though I have tried to do so for a long time. I simply ask for the vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question on the motion of the Senator from California, which is to postpone the bill regularly before the Senate for the purpose of taking up the resolution indicated by him.

The question being put on a viva voce vote, the Chair decided that the motion appeared not to be agreed to.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I ask for a division. I desire to have this question on the table so that it may be called up for action, no more. I want it before the Senate; it belongs here by right; and I have waited long for it.

Mr. POWELL. I am clearly of opinion that the Senate ought not to allow a committee to keep a matter the whole session in this way and not report.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I have been trying to get the floor for a long time to move in this matter, and I insist on a division.

A division being had, the yeas were 3 and the nays 20.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. CLARK and others called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is too late now, the vote of the Senate having disclosed the want of a quorum.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose if another motion were interposed that difficulty would not be in the way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No motion can be entertained by the Chair, except to adjourn or send for the absent members, when a vote discloses the want of a quorum. The presence of a quorum may, however, be developed by the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from California, and on this motion they have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 5, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Hendricks, McDougall, Powell, and Sautsbury—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Collamer, Cowan, Doolittle, Grimes, Harding, Henderson, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Sprague, Sumner, Wilkinson, and Wright—21.

So the motion was not agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and sixty-two, line three, after the word "been" to insert "heretofore."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "affixed," in line seven of section one hundred and sixty-two, to insert "with his initials."

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Those words "with his initials" are in the wrong line. They should appear after "affixed" in the eighth line. I move that they be transposed to that place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That transposition will be made if there be no objection; and the question is on the amendment in that form.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twelve of section one hundred and sixty-two, after the word "court" to insert "register, or recorder, respectively."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fifteen of section one hundred and sixty-two, after the word "prior" to strike out "or subsequent."

Mr. HENDRICKS. That question, of course, I suppose will be reserved for consideration in the Senate as the other amendments in relation to stamps.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It may be adopted now, but it will be open when we come into the Senate. I suggest to the Senator to make a memorandum of those questions that he will wish to reserve for separate votes in the Senate, so that they will not be overlooked.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and sixty-four, line one, after the word "that" to strike out "no" and insert "if any."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line five of section one hundred and sixty-four to strike out "waxed papers" and insert "wax tapers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten of section one hundred and sixty-four, after the word "mentioned" to strike out "and in default thereof," and to insert "he or they;" and after "dollars," in line twelve, to insert "for every omission to affix such stamp;" so as to read:

Without affixing thereto an adhesive stamp or label denoting the duty before mentioned, he or they shall incur a penalty of ten dollars for every omission to affix such stamp.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and sixty-six, line seven, after the word "shall" to strike out "hide" and insert "secrete;" and after "to be," in line eight, to strike out "hidden" and insert "secreted."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and sixty-seven, line three, after the word "or" to strike out "waxed" and insert "wax;" and after "tapers" to insert "cordials and other liquors manufactured wholly or in part of domestic spirits."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after "half," in line fifteen, to insert "of that."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section one hundred and sixty-eight the following proviso:

Provided, That when any such articles shall be sold by any person other than the manufacturer thereof, in the original and unbroken package in which the bottles or other inclosures were packed by the manufacturer, the person so selling said articles shall not be subject to any penalty on account of the want of the proper stamp.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and sixty-nine, alter the word "and," in line seven, to insert "to the," and strike out the final "s" in "assessors;" and after "United States" to insert "or designated depository thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section one hundred and sixty-nine the following clause:

And the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is further authorized, from time to time, to furnish, supply, and deliver to any manufacturer of friction or other matches, cigar lights, or wax tapers, a suitable quantity of adhesive or other stamps, such as may be prescribed for use in such cases, without prepayment therefor, on a credit not exceeding sixty days, requiring, in advance, such security as he may judge necessary to secure payment therefor within the time prescribed for such payment. And upon all bonds or other securities taken by said Commissioner under the provisions of this act, suits may be maintained in the circuit or district courts of the United States, in the several districts where the persons giving said bonds or other securities reside, in any appropriate form of action.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in schedule B, line seven, after the word "one," to insert "appraisalment," and after "paper" to strike out "or otherwise;" so that the clause will read:

Provided, That if more than one appraisalment, agreement, or contract shall be written upon one sheet or piece of paper, five cents for each and every additional appraisalment, agreement, or contract.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten of schedule B, after "money" to insert "whatsoever," and after "banker," insert "or;" after "or" to insert "for any sum exceeding ten dollars drawn upon," and after "any" to insert "other;" so as to read:

Bank check, draft, or order for the payment of any sum of money whatsoever, drawn upon any bank, banker, or trust company, or for any sum exceeding $10 drawn upon any other person or persons, companies, or corporations, at sight or on demand, 2 cents.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is now a limitation that bank checks for less than twenty dollars need not be stamped. How does this affect that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That limitation is taken away as to checks on banks; but makes a limitation of ten dollars on checks drawn on other persons.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move, in lines forty-seven, forty-eight, and forty-nine of schedule B, to strike out "where the penalty or money ultimately recoverable thereupon is $1,000;" and also to strike out lines fifty, fifty-one, and fifty-two, which are:

Where the penalty or money ultimately recoverable thereupon exceeds $1,000, for every additional $1,000, or fractional part thereof in excess of $1,000, 50 cents.

The result of my amendment is to leave the provision as to bonds to stand thus:

Bond.—For indemnifying any person for the payment of any sum of money, or for the due execution or performance of the duties of any office, or to account for money received by virtue thereof, 50 cents.

Bond of any description, other than such as may be required in legal proceedings, or used in connection with mortgage deeds, and not otherwise charged in this schedule, 25 cents.

There are collectors and other officers who give bonds for the honest discharge of their duties who might have to pay a stamp tax of $50 or $100 if the provision be left as it has come to us.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines sixty-one, sixty-three, and sixty-four of schedule B, respectively, to strike out "hundred" and insert "thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

Certificate of profits, or any certificate or memorandum showing an interest in the property or accumulations of any incorporated company, if for a sum not less than $10 and not exceeding $50, 10 cents.

Exceeding $50 and not exceeding $1,000, 25 cents.

Exceeding $1,000, for every additional $1,000, or fractional part thereof, 25 cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line one hundred and five of schedule B to insert:

Gaugers' returns, if for a quantity not exceeding five hundred gallons gross, 10 cents.

Exceeding five hundred gallons gross, 25 cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line one hundred and thirty-eight of schedule B to insert:

Measurers' returns, if for a quantity not exceeding one thousand bushels, 10 cents.

Exceeding one thousand bushels, 25 cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I want to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether, where a mortgage is given for the security of a note; the note and the mortgage both are to be stamped? In line one hundred and forty-two I see the provision is that the mortgage shall bear a stamp according to its size and value; but must the note also by which the mortgage is secured be stamped?

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a previous provision that only one of them need be stamped.

Mr. POMEROY. I had not seen that. I was looking for it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to what appears in line one hundred and sixty-one, on the page we are now reading. It proposes a stamp upon a passage ticket for a passage by any vessel "from a port in the United States to a foreign port," and the words are comprehensive enough to embrace foreign vessels. I doubt very much whether there is authority to execute it on foreign vessels. We can pass it by now, though, and think of it afterwards.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that we can make any different provision in that respect from that which we have made.

The next amendment was in schedule B, after line one hundred and eighty-five, to strike out the following clause:

Receipts for the payment of any sum of money, or for the payment of any debt due, not being for the satisfaction of any mortgage or judgment or decree of any court, and a receipt for the delivery of any property, 2 cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. In line two hundred of that schedule the word "whisky" ought to be inserted before "beef."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is that qualified by the words, "or other salted, cured, or preserved meats?" The clause reads:

Warehouse receipt for not exceeding fifty barrels of beef, pork, or bacon, or other salted, cured, dried, or preserved meats held in storage in any public or private warehouse or yard, 10 cents.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not affected.

Mr. JOHNSON. Strike out the word "other."

Mr. SHERMAN. "Other" ought to be stricken out, but the words "or other" would relate only to the meats and not to the whisky. I move to strike out the word "other." It does no harm, but it might as well be left out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose "or other" might as well be left in.

Mr. JOHNSON. Insert "or" after "whisky," and then it will be plain enough. I move to insert the word "or" after "whisky."

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I want to ask the Senator from Ohio what he selected whisky for and left out all other liquors? Are they provided for in some other place?

Mr. SHERMAN. Whisky is stored in very large quantities by the barrel, and it is an article that will yield some revenue. You might put in some other things, but no other article that I know of now would yield much revenue. Beer and ale are very seldom stored except at the place of manufacture. Whisky, though, is an article of commerce, and is stored in large quantities in the cities.

The next amendment was in schedule B, after line two hundred and fifteen, to insert the following:

Weights' returns, if for a weight not exceeding five thousand pounds, 10 cents.
Exceeding five thousand pounds, 25 cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to insert after the word "either," in the two hundred and twenty-first line of the schedule, the word "of," so that it will read:

Writ, or other original process by which any suit is commenced in any court of record, either of law or equity, 50 cents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection, to make the style more correct.

The next amendment was in schedule B, line two hundred and thirty-three, after the word

"provided," to insert "or by any police or municipal court having no larger jurisdiction as to the amount of damages it may render than a justice of the peace in the same State;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That no writ, summons, or other process issued by and returnable to a justice of the peace, except as hereinbefore provided, or by any police or municipal court having no larger jurisdiction as to the amount of damages it may render than a justice of the peace in the same State, or issued in any original or other suits commenced by the United States or any State, shall be subject to the payment of stamp duties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in schedule C, line four, to strike out the word "or" between "troches" and "lozenges."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in schedule C, line sixty-four, after the word "lights," to insert the word "and," and after the word "tapers" to strike out the words "or matches made without the use of sulphur;" so that it will read:

For all cigar lights and wax tapers, double the rates herein imposed upon friction or lucifer matches.

The next amendment was in schedule C, line sixty-eight, after the word "lights" to insert "or;" and after the word "tapers" to strike out the words "or matches made without the use of sulphur;" and in line seventy to strike out "July" and insert "August;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That so far as this act relates to friction or lucifer matches made in part of wood, or to cigar lights or wax tapers, the same shall not take effect until the 1st day of August, 1864.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to amend that amendment by inserting "September" instead of "August," and by adding after "1864," in line seventy, these words, "or apply to manufactured stock on hand when this act shall go into operation."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me suggest to the Senator that the committee still have that matter under consideration; and if we adopt the amendment now which they propose, it can be struck out when we get into the Senate if it be necessary to do so. There is a great deal of difficulty about it so as to provide against frauds, and we would rather have the amendment adopted as it is, and then, if we cannot come to some arrangement, the Senator can move his proposition in the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well. I withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have not yet concluded our examination on this matter. I trust the Senator will make a memorandum of it, so that it shall not be forgotten when the bill comes into the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seventy-one of schedule C, after the word "pictures" to insert "except copies of engravings and works of art;" so as to make the clause read:

Photographs, ambrotypes, daguerreotypes, or any sun pictures, except copies of engravings and works of art, upon each and every picture of which the retail price shall not exceed 25 cents, 2 cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move to amend by striking out in that section, on page 226, from line seventy-one down to the eightieth line—to strike out all the provisions in regard to stamps on photographs, ambrotypes, and daguerreotypes.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not understand why the provision should be struck out.

Mr. CLARK. I will state to the Senator and to the Senate the reason why the committee desire to strike it out. There are some of these articles so very small, not bigger than half your finger nail, on which it is impossible to affix a stamp; and the committee propose to amend on the 135th page, section ninety-two, where there is a provision that photographs or any other sun picture, being copies of engravings or works of art, or used for the illustration of books, shall pay a duty of five per cent. ad valorem. It is proposed to assess the tax ad valorem on the whole of them. I shall move that amendment hereafter if this be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from

New Hampshire to strike out from line seventy-one to line seventy-nine, in the following words:

Photographs, ambrotypes, daguerreotypes, or any sun pictures, except copies of engravings and works of art, upon each and every picture of which the retail price shall not exceed 25 cents, 2 cents.

Exceeding the retail price of 25 cents, and not exceeding the sum of 50 cents, 3 cents.

Exceeding the retail price of 50 cents, and not exceeding $1, 5 cents.

Exceeding the retail price of $1, for every additional dollar or fractional part thereof, 5 cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in schedule C, lines eighty-one, eighty-three, eighty-five, eighty-seven, and eighty-nine respectively, to strike out the word "retail" before "price;" in line eighty-one to strike out "five" and insert "two" before "cents;" in line eighty-four to strike out "ten" and insert "four" before "cents;" in line eighty-six to strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten" before "cents;" in line eighty-eight to strike out "thirty" and insert "fifteen" before "cents;" and in line ninety to strike out "twenty" and insert "five" before "cents;" so as to make the clause read:

Playing-Cards.—For and upon every pack of whatever number, when the price per pack does not exceed 18 cents, 2 cents.

Exceeding the price of 18 cents, and not exceeding 25 cents per pack, 4 cents.

Exceeding the price of 25, and not exceeding 50 cents per pack, 10 cents.

Exceeding the price of 50 cents, and not exceeding $1 per pack, 15 cents.

Exceeding the price of $1, for every additional 50 cents, or fractional part thereof, in excess of $1, 5 cents.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not in favor of these amendments unless the chairman or some gentleman of the committee can give some reason why the tax on playing-cards proposed by the House of Representatives should be reduced by the Senate. I think they are a very proper subject of taxation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We reduce it with a view to get more revenue out of this subject of taxation if we can. The largest part of the revenue probably is derived from a very cheap description of card. We examined the subject two years ago. At that time the other House proposed a very large tax in the same way. If you put it on with a view to lessening the use of cards as much as possible, it might perhaps have the effect; but we became satisfied on examination that if the idea is to get a revenue out of this source of taxation, we must put upon it something like a proportionate duty to that imposed upon other articles. A great many of the cards, those that are used most, are a cheap kind which are used in eating-houses and on board steamboats and perhaps on railroad cars. They are used by persons who not paying a large price for them do not keep them, but perhaps throw them out of the window when they are done with them, and they are not used for playing again. The largest number of cards is probably used in that way. If you put a high duty upon them, the result will be that when they are purchased they will be played with again and again, being used economically. We became satisfied that the result of imposing so high a duty would be that we should in reality lessen the revenue instead of increasing it. If we want to get a good respectable revenue out of cards, we must put on a moderate duty and must not impose a tax with a view to put an end to the use of the article. It is hardly worth while to go on the idea that the use of playing-cards is always vicious when it is a matter of such common amusement with so many sorts of people.

I may state that a friend of mine belonging to a club of gentlemen told me in reference to the last duty imposed on playing-cards, that at that club, until the price was raised so much in consequence of the duty being put upon cards, they never thought of using a pack of cards a second time; but when the price increased so much in consequence of the duty, it became somewhat common to lay aside a pack that was used and play with it a second time. They found it necessary to economize. The same result will follow in a very much larger degree if we increase the duty so much as is now proposed. The reasoning upon which the committee proceeded was to get as large a revenue out of the article as we possibly can.

Mr. JOHNSON. To have as many packs made as possible. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have not been guided by the question whether the thing was to be used well or ill, but simply by the consideration how we could get the most money. That was our object. I think the present revenue from this source is fifty or sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The other day the argument of the Senator from Maine was so powerful as to stagger my judgment upon the question whether a high tax upon whisky would reduce its use, and I think the passion for card-playing, perhaps, is almost as strong as the passion for liquor; and playing-cards can very well bear a high tax. If the committee has investigated the subject thoroughly, I do not insist on the provision as it stands in the bill, but I should like to have the vote of the Senate upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We came to the conclusion which I have stated; but if a committee of conference, which will undoubtedly be raised, shall be satisfied to the contrary, I shall be willing to put this tax up to the highest notch.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after "1862," in line five of section one hundred and seventy-three, to insert "except the one hundred and nineteenth section thereof."

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate ought to understand the importance of this exception. I am not prepared now to give any definite opinion as to the propriety of continuing the direct tax on land, but the exception does reserve and continue in force the direct tax after 1865. The one hundred and nineteenth section of the act of 1862 referred to is as follows:

Sec. 119. And be it further enacted, That so much of an act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1861, as imposes a direct tax of $20,000,000 on the United States, shall be held to authorize the levy and collection of one tax to that amount; and no other tax shall be levied under and by virtue thereof until the 1st day of April, 1865, when the same shall be in full force and effect.

If this exception is put in, as a matter of course it will continue the direct tax after next year. I so understand the effect of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If this exception is not put in it will be continued.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not understand it so. The act from which I have read is repealed by the section now under consideration.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And that would leave the original act laying a direct tax in full force.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know about that. Here you except from the operation of the repeal section one hundred and nineteen, which itself continues the direct tax. I will read that section again, so that Senators can see that if it is kept in force it will continue the direct tax:

Sec. 119. And be it further enacted, That so much of an act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1861, as imposes a direct tax of $20,000,000 on the United States, shall be held to authorize the levy and collection of one tax to that amount; and no other tax shall be levied under and by virtue thereof until the 1st day of April, 1865, when the same shall be in full force and effect.

If this one hundred and nineteenth section of the act of 1862 is excepted from the repeal, the effect will be to continue the direct tax on the 1st of April, 1865, and so from that time. I do not know whether that is the purpose of the committee, but that seems to me to be the legal effect of making this exception.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The intention was to leave that section in force. If we repeal the one hundred and nineteenth section, does not the law laying a direct tax necessarily revive and go into operation at once?

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps so; but if you keep it alive it will continue the direct tax next year, and so on after that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is what we design, to keep that section alive. That section suspends the direct tax for the present, but after next year it goes into effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. My impression is that if we wish to lay the direct tax we had better insert it directly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The idea is not to meddle with that. By the one hundred and nineteenth section of the act of 1862 we have suspended the direct tax until the year 1865. That is the effect of that section. Now if you repeal that section, does not the law imposing the direct tax go into effect immediately again, so that it is laid this year and next year? If you do not repeal that section, it stands just as it did before, suspended until the year 1865, and then it is to go into operation. We do not propose this year to act upon it in any way, but to leave the matter as it stands, suspended until next year.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senate precisely to that point. The Senate will also perceive that the amendment suggested in lines thirteen and fourteen of section one hundred and seventy-three ought to be inserted in lines five and six, because the second act repealed, the act of December 25, 1862, is a short act and does not contain any section one hundred and fifteen. That is intended to be repealed by the bill as it comes to us. No doubt there has been a mistake in the printing of this section. The words "except the one hundred and fifteenth section thereof," which are proposed to be inserted as an amendment in lines thirteen and fourteen of this section, should be inserted in lines five and six. I think, however, that the one hundred and fifteenth section of the act of 1862 should be repealed; I will read it:

"Sec. 115. And be it further enacted, That the pay of the assessors, assistant assessors, collectors, and deputy collectors shall be paid out of the accruing internal duties or taxes before the same is paid into the Treasury, according to such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; and for the purpose of paying the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and clerks, procuring dies, stamps, adhesive stamps, paper, printing forms and regulations, advertising, and any other expenses of carrying this act into effect, the sum of $500,000 be, and hereby is, appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

I think we agreed in committee that that section should be repealed, and that another section should take its place.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Finance propose to insert as the last section of this bill this provision:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the pay of the assessors, assistant assessors, collectors, and deputy collectors shall be paid out of the accruing internal duties or taxes before the same is paid into the Treasury, according to such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; and for the purpose of paying the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and clerks, procuring dies, stamps, adhesive stamps, paper, printing forms and regulations, advertising, and any other expenses of carrying this act into effect, the sum of $400,000 be, and hereby is, appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The new act which we propose begins its operations next July, at the end of this fiscal year. Up to the end of this year, the matters must proceed as they are now. There is about one hundred thousand dollars left of the appropriation made by the one hundred and fifteenth section of the act of 1862, and we thought it best to leave it still in order to finish out this year, and therefore not to include that section in the repealing clause.

The new provision only commences after the close of this fiscal year. I am told by the Commissioner that there is about one hundred thousand dollars left of that $500,000 appropriation, and some portion of it at least, how much we do not know, will be necessary in order to meet the expenses under the existing law. I do not know but that the Senator from Ohio is right as to the place where the exception should be put in. On consideration I think the Senator is right in that respect, and therefore I move to put in the words "one hundred and fifteenth and" before "one hundred and nineteenth" in the fifth line, so as to except from the repeal the one hundred and fifteenth and one hundred and nineteenth sections of the act of 1862.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then in the thirteenth and fourteenth lines the words "except the one hundred and fifteenth section thereof" should be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the committee is to insert those words, and the Chair will put that question.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in section one hundred and seventy-three, line twenty-four, to strike out "second" where it occurs the second time and insert "section."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That clerical mistake will be corrected.

The next amendment was in line thirty of section one hundred and seventy-three, after the word "repealed" to insert:

And that an act entitled "An act to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes," approved March 7, 1864, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith, be also repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-five of section one hundred and seventy-three, to strike out after "taxes" the word "already," and to insert "properly;" after "assessed" to insert "under the provisions of former acts," and in line thirty-seven, after the word "forfeitures" to strike out "already accrued" and to insert "incurred under and by virtue thereof;" so as to read:

Provided, That all the provisions of said acts shall be in force for levying and collecting all taxes properly assessed under the provisions of former acts, and of maintaining and continuing liens, fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under and by virtue thereof, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. In line thirty-six, I think the amendment there ought to be amended by inserting the words "or accruing," so as to read:

That all the provisions of said acts shall be in force for levying and collecting all taxes properly assessed or accruing under the provisions, &c.

That would cover the case of the income tax not yet assessed, but accruing, where the person is absent; and so of licenses. I move this amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am obliged to the Senator from Ohio for his suggestion. What we want to cover is to keep those provisions in force to include all the taxes already assessed or that must be assessed under them, that do not come under this act. If that is broad enough to cover it, very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am a little afraid yet that the language is not broad enough, but we can keep it under advisement.

Mr. CLARK. I have provisions already drawn to come in at some other place to cover what the Senator from Maine suggests.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a very important matter; we may repeal the old laws before we get this into operation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall be glad to hear any suggestion that occurs to any Senator about it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was in line forty of section one hundred and seventy-three, after the word "commenced" to strike out "in enforcing" and to insert "or that may be commenced to enforce."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line forty-eight after "appointment" to strike out "and;" after "bonds" to strike out "or" and insert "and;" and after "office" in line forty-nine to strike out "and provided, also," and insert "section one hundred and seventy-four, and be it further enacted," so as to convert the proviso into a new section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to call the attention of gentlemen to section one hundred and seventy-three, as I should really like to have their opinion upon it. We were under the impression that there might be considerable danger in it; inasmuch as we repeal the former act under which these officers were appointed, and under which their bonds were given with sureties, and pass a new act containing other provisions, we doubted whether unless they executed new bonds their sureties will be held. Here is a provision that the office shall not be vacated, but the officers shall continue to hold the office without reappointment. It would be a matter of very great inconvenience unquestionably to require reappointments, and if that is the law a time must elapse when they will not be under bond, between the passage of the act and the giving of new bonds. If that is unnecessary it would be very much better to strike out all after the word "reappointment" in line forty-eight; but if there is any doubt about it, in order to meet the difficulty, or rather to lessen the inconvenience in some measure, I have an amendment to be added at the end of the section. The question is, whether (these officers having been appointed, and having given bonds under the former law, we now repealing that law, but passing another on the same subject-matter, and providing that they shall continue to hold their offices,) their sureties or they themselves will be held under the bonds formerly given. I should really like to have the opinion of gentlemen learned in the law on that subject. We had not time to examine the authorities on the subject; but the Commissioner stated that there had been some decisions to the effect that, if new laws were passed on the same subject, imposing additional obligations, the bonds would still hold; but here is a case where the old law is entirely repealed and a new one substituted, and we continue the same officers. We should be very glad to get rid of the difficulty.

Mr. JOHNSON. The provision for the execution of new bonds is not a provision suggested by the Senate committee, but, as I understand it, is in the original bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is in the bill, and we merely propose to alter the phraseology.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not prepared to speak positively, but according to my recollection the courts have decided that the repeal of a law creating an office under which the officer is required to give bond, extinguishes the liability; but I should not understand this as a case of repeal in that sense. The repeal that puts an end to the obligation of the office is a repeal which puts the officer out of office.

Mr. COLLAMER. The fear is here, that inasmuch as the bill undertakes to say that the old act is repealed, the result may follow which is apprehended. If the office is continued, the bond is continued of course; but the question is, can the office be continued without reappointment?

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that; but I was about to assume that that could be done; we will examine that in a moment. Assuming that that could be done, certainly the obligation of the officer and of his bond would remain; but if that could not be done, and the law is to be considered as a law repealing altogether the original law under which the appointment was made, the bond would fall with it.

The honorable chairman mentioned the question to me a few moments ago, and upon thinking of it I thought all difficulty might be avoided perhaps by making the repeal not an absolute one but a conditional one; and with that view I thought of proposing to insert after the word "repealed," in the thirtieth line of the section, the words "and shall have no operation except as is provided for in the following part of this section." That, I think, would keep the responsibility of the bond; otherwise it may be necessary perhaps to require new bonds to be executed.

Mr. COLLAMER. As the chairman of the committee has asked for the opinion of Senators on this point, I will say that I think the question resolves itself into this: the responsibility of the bond can be preserved if the office can be. If the office is superseded by the repeal of the law, your mere saying that it is continued does not continue it. If the law creating the office is repealed, though you may have the same officer, he must be appointed again. Everything depends upon the manner of the repeal. If you absolutely repeal the present law, you cannot continue under this law the officers appointed under that without a reappointment, and then the bond would be discharged; but if you only repeal it qualifiedly, if you express the repeal in such a way that that law shall be and remain in force except in so far as it is altered, amended, or changed by the present law, then the officer will continue and the bond will continue.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose the object can also be accomplished by a suggestion which has been made to me by my friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK.] The proviso now reads:

That all the provisions of said acts shall be in force for levying and collecting all taxes properly assessed or accruing under the provision of former acts, and of maintaining and continuing liens, fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under and by virtue thereof, and for carrying out and completing all proceedings which have been already commenced or that may be commenced to enforce such fines, penalties, and forfeitures.

My friend from New Hampshire suggests that we insert there, "and also for continuing the officers heretofore appointed," and so on.

Several SENATORS. Let us settle that in the morning.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we had better pass over the remaining portion of the section and fix it more at our leisure. It will need a little more careful looking at than we can give it here hurriedly in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This section will be passed over for the present. It will be considered that amendments to the section are still open.

The next amendment was to strike out section one hundred and seventy-four of the bill, as follows:

Sec. 174. And be it further enacted, That on all sales of ice there shall be paid five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why not tax ice?

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have the subject yet under consideration. The difficulty is how to tax it. If you tax all sales of ice you will do what you do not do in any other case—tax sales. If you undertake to tax every pound sold by A to B and B to C by the pound, it cannot be followed in that way. It must be taxed in the ice-houses or places of deposit by the ton in order to get at it.

Mr. SHERMAN. And it should only be taxed when removed for consumption or sale.

Mr. FESSENDEN. When removed for consumption and sale we must provide for keeping an account and bringing it under a former section. The subject is yet under consideration. As it stands in this section it cannot be executed without doing violence to the whole principle of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section one hundred and seventy-six, as follows:

Sec. 176. And be it further enacted, That the tax levied in section ninety-three shall not be held to apply to vessels propelled exclusively by sails.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section one hundred and seventy-eight, as follows:

Sec. 178. And be it further enacted, That all spirits of domestic production, and held for sale on the 1st day of May, 1864, and upon which no tax shall have been paid, shall be subject to a duty of fifty cents per gallon; and all such spirits on hand for sale upon which a prior duty shall have been paid shall be subject to a duty of thirty cents per gallon: Provided, That bona fide retail dealers in spirits, duly licensed, shall not be taxed on their stock on hand whose quantity on hand does not exceed two barrels.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let that section be passed over. We cannot possibly consider it to-night.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let the section be considered as stricken out and bring it up in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better take that up in the morning.

Mr. CLARK. Pass it now, and when we have read the bill through return to it. That will leave it as unfinished business for the morning.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is not worth while to take two votes on it.

Mr. CLARK. We do not take any vote on it now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose that one vote after discussion will settle the matter one way or the other. It makes no difference to me.

Mr. SHERMAN. Pass it over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By common consent section one hundred and seventy-eight will be passed over and the question not taken on striking it out.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That every collector to whom any duty upon cotton shall be paid shall mark the bales or other packages upon which the duty shall have been paid in such manner as may clearly indicate the payment thereof, and shall give to the owner, or other person having charge of such cotton, a permit for the removal of the same, stating therein the amount and payment of the duty, the time and place of payment, the weight and marks upon the bales and packages, so that the same may be fully identified. Whenever any cotton, the product of the United States, shall arrive at any port of the United States from any State in insurrection against the Government, the assessor or assistant assessor shall immediately assess the taxes due thereon, and shall, without delay, return the same to the collector or deputy collector of said district, and the said collector or deputy collector shall demand of the owner, or other person having charge of such cotton, the tax imposed by this act, and assessed thereon, unless evidence of previous payment of such tax shall be produced, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall from time to time prescribe; and in case the tax so assessed shall not be paid to such collector within ten days after demand, the collector or deputy collector, as aforesaid, shall institute proceedings for the recovery of the tax, as hereinbefore provided, which said tax shall be a lien upon said cotton from the time when said assessment shall be made: Provided, That all cotton sold by or on account of the Government of the United States shall be free and exempt from duty at the time of and after the sale thereof, and the same shall be marked free, and the purchaser furnished with such a bill of sale as shall clearly and accurately describe the same, which shall be deemed and taken to be a permit authorizing the sale or removal thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to offer several amendments to the bill, which I desire may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received and ordered to be printed, if there be no objection.

The next amendment was to add the following as an additional section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That consuls of foreign countries in the United States, who are not citizens thereof, shall be, and hereby are, exempt from any income tax imposed by the act referred to in the first section of this act, which may be derived from their official emoluments, or from property in such countries: Provided, That the Governments which such consuls may represent shall extend similar exemption to consuls of the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is an error in the drawing of that section. The words in the fourth line, "imposed by the act referred to in the first section of this act," should read "imposed by this act." I move to strike out the words "the act referred to in the first section of."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as a new section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That, where it is not otherwise provided for in this act, it shall be the duty of the collectors, in their respective districts, and they are hereby authorized, to prosecute for the recovery of any sum or sums that may be forfeited by virtue of this act; and all fines, penalties, and forfeitures which may be imposed or incurred by virtue of this act shall and may be sued for and recovered, where not otherwise herein provided, in the name of the United States, or of the collector within whose district any such fine, forfeiture, or penalty shall have been incurred in any proper form of action, or by any appropriate form of proceeding, before any circuit or district court of the United States for the district within which said fine, penalty, or forfeiture may have been incurred, or before any court of competent jurisdiction; and, where not otherwise herein provided for, one moiety shall be to the use of the person who, if a collector or deputy collector, shall first inform of the cause, matter, or thing whereby any such fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall have been incurred, and the other moiety to the use of the United States. And the several circuit and district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of all offenses against any of the provisions of this act committed within their several districts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following as a new section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That if any person liable and required to pay a tax upon any article, goods, wares, merchandise, or manufactures, as herein provided, shall sell, or cause or allow the same to be sold, before the tax to which such article, goods, wares, merchandise, or manufacture is legally liable is paid, with intent to avoid such tax, or in fraud of the revenue herein provided, any debt contracted in the sale of such article, goods, wares, merchandise, or manufactures, or any security given therefor, unless the same shall have been bona fide transferred to the hands of an innocent holder, shall be entirely void, and the collection thereof shall not be enforced in any court. And if any such article, goods, wares, merchandise, or manufacture has been paid for in whole or in part, the sum so paid shall be deemed forfeited; and any person who will sue for the same in an action of debt shall recover of the seller the amount so paid, one half to his own use and the other half to the use of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is to be the final section of the bill. I think that may as well be omitted, as that matter is yet under consideration by the committee. Do not read the final section yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The last section will be passed over, then, without being acted upon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have passed over several sections which will occasion some debate, and especially the one in regard to liquors on hand and the one with reference to banks. We can take one of those up in the morning.

Mr. CLARK. Take up one now, so as to have it the pending question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The whole bill will be a special order at any rate. We have not got through with it. We can make our choice in the morning.

Mr. POWELL. If it is in order, I have an amendment that I desire to offer as an additional section to the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have not finished the committee's amendments yet.

Mr. CLARK. Perhaps the Senator from Kentucky wants his amendment printed.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Kentucky can give notice of his amendment and have it printed.

Mr. POWELL. My amendment is to repeal the law giving bounties to vessels engaged in the cod-fisheries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky can be received and laid upon the table, to be acted upon when in order.

Mr. POWELL. I will keep it until the proper time. I notify the Senate that I will offer it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANCONA moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRANKED MATTER.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill in relation to franked matter, for the purpose of having it considered now. It will require but a moment's time.

No objection being made, the bill (S. No. 248) in relation to franked matter was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time by its title.

The bill, which was read, provides that all communications relating to the official business of the Department to which they are addressed, of whatever origin, addressed to the chiefs of the several Executive Departments of the Government, or to such principal officers of each Executive Department, being heads of bureaus or chief clerks, or one duly authorized by the Postmaster General to frank official matter, shall be received and conveyed by mail free of postage without being indorsed "official business" or with the name of the writer.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER, as the regular order of business, proceeded to call the committees for reports of a private nature, commencing with the Committee of Claims.

D. McV. STUART.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of D. McV. Stuart; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the bill and accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HORACE E. DIMMICK.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Horace E. Dimmick; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the bill and accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PRACTICE IN COURTS OF JUSTICE.

Mr. ALLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to prescribe the practice in courts of justice in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

C. J. FIELD AND C. F. CLAY.

Mr. HALE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of C. J. Field and C. F. Clay; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM BRINDLE.

Mr. HALE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, also reported a bill for the relief of William Brindle, which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that there be allowed to William Brindle, late receiver of public moneys at LeCompton, Kansas, for extra clerk hire and office rent, as settled and allowed by the Secretary of the Interior, under the act of Congress of 18th of August, 1856, $4,703.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the bill be put on its passage. It does not take any money out of the Treasury; he is indebted to the Government to this amount, and the bill only settles his accounts.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that the bill does not take money out of the Treasury. Now, if this bill be not passed, will not this man have to pay this amount into the Treasury?

Mr. HALE. I suppose he will, but it is not likely under the circumstances that any administration of the Government will require him to do so. The Secretary of the Interior states that this expense was incurred under an act of Congress, and that this man is entitled to this amount.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The House will judge for itself on the facts whether it was authorized or not. I oppose this bill with no expectation of success. But I wish to call the attention of the House to the items, so that we may act understandingly in reference to voting away this money.

Mr. HALE. This same amount was passed in one of the general appropriation bills, and failed at the last hours of the session on account of the want of time. It passed then and perhaps it ought to pass now in that shape.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman that as there is no report from the committee this bill had better be recommitted and come back to us with a report of all the facts, and then be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HALE. The Secretary of the Interior recommends the appropriation because this man was authorized to incur this expense by act of Congress.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This man was an officer of the Government under a salary.

Mr. HALE. The act of Congress authorized the employment of additional clerk hire, and an appropriation is necessary to pay for that clerk hire.

Mr. FENTON. I hope that my friend from Pennsylvania will consent to have this matter take the direction suggested by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HALE. The report of the Secretary of the Interior states all the facts in the case.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If there be such a law, as is alleged, authorizing the payment of office rent and extra clerk hire, then it must be within the power of the Secretary of the Interior to allow it without the passage of this bill. And I would like to know, if under the law of 1856 this man was entitled to pay for clerk hire and rent, why it has not been paid by the General Land Office.

Mr. HALE. I send the law to the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will read it. The seventh section is as follows:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That in the settlement of the accounts of registers and receivers of the public land offices, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow, subject to the approval of Congress, such reasonable compensation for additional clerical services and extraordinary expenses incident to said offices as he shall think just and proper, and report to Congress all such cases of allowance at each succeeding session, with estimates of the sum or sums required to pay the same.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that this act or provision was adopted for the purpose of giving Congress the revision in regard to the allowance of these items. The case now comes before us under that law for our revision, and I take it that if it comes in as a claim under that law it should come in in a regular appropriation bill.

The letter upon which this proceeding is founded was written in 1861 by Moses Kelly, who was then acting Secretary of the Interior in place of Jacob Thompson, who turned traitor and left the Cabinet of Mr. Buchanan, and it was addressed to Robert W. Johnson, of Arkansas, who also turned traitor and left the Government. Here are the items set forth in this letter of Mr. Kelly, upon which Congress is to pass: for rent from 1857 to 1860, $1,145; and for extra clerks, $440.

Mr. HALE. The Secretary of the Interior, in obedience to the act of Congress, has settled these claims, and has reported the fact that so much money is needed to pay them, and now Congress is merely called upon to carry out the recommendation of its own officer. I know of no reason why the claim should not be passed, and I therefore move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question being upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time,

Mr. HALE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. NELSON and WOODBRIDGE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 46.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HALE demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Arnold, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Driggs, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Gauson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harrington, Herick, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbelsch, Kernan, King, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marey, Marvin, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, Charles O'Neill, Perry, Pruyn, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Smith, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Thayer, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Windom, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Beaman, Boyd, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Gooch, Grinnell, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Burlingame, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Rollins, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Winfield—58.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. J. STEVENS'S HEIRS.

Mr. PRUYN, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of the heirs of the late J. J. Stevens; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

E. F. AND S. A. WOOD.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, by unanimous consent, reported a joint resolution repealing an act entitled "An act for the relief of E. F. & Samuel A. Wood," approved March 28, 1864; which was read a first and second time, postponed until Wednesday next after the morning hour, made a special order, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE BUSINESS.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to set apart Thursday of next week, after the morning hour, for the consideration of the business of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary what has become of the resolution I introduced early in January last, relative to providing for winding up insolvent national banks and enforcing individual liability against the stockholders.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires first to know whether there be objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President was received, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, informing the House that he had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution, of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 15) to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana;

An act (H. R. No. 300) for the classification of the clerks to paymasters in the Navy, and graduating their pay; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 74) referring the claim of J. H. Clark & Co. to the Court of Claims.

KENTUCKY CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. SMITHERS. I now call up the Kentucky contested-election case, and ask that the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections may be read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That George H. Yeaman is entitled to a seat in this House as the Representative from the second congressional district of Kentucky in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest before the gentleman from Delaware proceeds that the order of speaking on the part of the contestant and sitting member shall be fixed, inasmuch as some difficulty occurred in determining the order of debate in the Missouri contested-election case.

Mr. SMITHERS. I had supposed the same order of debate would be observed as in the Missouri case; that the contestant would be permitted to occupy an hour, the sitting member to follow, being entitled to occupy an hour and a half, and the contestant to close the debate, with half an hour, subject to the right of the member reporting the resolution, under the rules of the House, after the previous question shall have been ordered.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, that course will be followed.

Mr. SMITHERS. In pursuance of notice, I now ask the attention of the House to the contested election of the second congressional district of Kentucky, in which John H. McHenry, jr., contests the seat of Hon. George H. Yeaman.

In proceeding to develop the case I shall be exceedingly brief, because, as it strikes me, it lies in a very narrow compass, and I shall endeavor to present only such facts as the majority of the committee—being the whole of it, I believe, with the exception of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] who presented the minority report in this case—believed sufficient to sustain the conclusion that Hon. George H. Yeaman is rightfully entitled to the seat he now holds. The congressional district is composed of twelve counties, namely: Breckinridge, Butler, Christian, Daviess, Edmondson, Grayson, Hancock, Henderson, Hopkins, McLean, Muhlenberg, and Ohio, and in each of which counties the sitting member received a majority of the votes cast. The election, as the result of which Mr. Yeaman received his certificate, was held in August, 1863. At that election there were cast 11,398 votes, of which George H. Yeaman received 8,311, and John H. McHenry, jr., 3,087, being a majority for the sitting member of 5,224, nearly double the entire number of votes received by the contestant. It is manifest, therefore, from this presentation of the case, that there can be no pretense of claim upon the part of the contestant. Either the whole election is void or the sitting member is entitled to the seat he occupies. It is not pretended that John H. McHenry, jr., received more than 3,087 votes, or that illegal votes were cast for his opponent, so as to form the basis of any valid claim on his part.

The sole question, therefore, for the House to consider is, whether the election was void, or whether the sitting member is entitled to the seat which he now occupies by virtue of the certificate. That is the only question I shall present to the House, for it is the only one presented by the report of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. Speaker, I shall omit to say anything concerning certain military orders issued by Colonel Shackelford and General Burnside. The House will perceive, if they look at the report of the committee, that the Legislature of Kentucky had passed what is familiarly known as the expatriation act, which required an oath from every voter at the election that he had not after the passage of that act given any aid or comfort to the rebellion. Governor Robinson, shortly before the election, issued his proclamation calling the attention of the people of Kentucky to the existence of the statute. After that proclamation certain military orders were issued which are printed in the report of the committee, and to which I presume members have had their attention called. It is not my purpose, as I have already said, to take up these military orders or the proclamation of the Governor of Kentucky.

It is manifest that the only question before us is whether there was in fact an election by the people of the second congressional district of the State of Kentucky, and whether the majority of the voters of that district did actually choose Mr. Yeaman as their Representative; for I presume it will not be contended that if, despite the orders, such majority did fairly indicate their preference for him, the election was thereby invalidated.

As I have stated already the whole number of votes cast was 11,398, and of those the sitting member received 8,311, nearly three fourths of all the votes cast at that election. It only becomes requisite therefore that we shall determine whether the voting capacity of the district was out; and we can only determine that by the vote cast at prior elections. When we turn to these elections and compare the vote cast with this vote we find the following to be the result: the largest vote ever cast in the second congressional district was in 1860, amounting to 15,236. At the next election, which was for members to the border States convention, in 1861, the vote was 13,328. The vote cast for member of Congress in 1861 was 14,656; and at the election by virtue of which the sitting member holds his seat there were cast 11,398 votes. It must be remembered that the voting capacity of the whole district was affected by the condition of society existing in all of the border States where rebellion has been rampant. But we are not left to conjecture alone on that question. It is in evidence by the certificate of the adjutant general of the State of Kentucky, of October 9, 1863, that 5,714 volunteers were furnished by the second congressional district alone to the armies of the United States. Add these to the vote that was actually cast and it brings it up to the full voting capacity of the second congressional district. Taking the fact that of the 11,398 votes cast Mr. Yeaman received 8,311, and that the largest vote ever cast in the district was 15,236, it is impossible by any species of arithmetic with which the majority of the committee are familiar to come to any other result than that the sitting member is entitled to his seat.

I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to enter into the details of this contest; so far as they are concerned I will leave them to be dealt with by the sitting member as he may deem just and proper. But I cannot forbear calling the attention of the House to the estimate of the contestant himself as to what his chances were, as shown in a letter addressed by him to the voters of the second congressional district of Kentucky, prior to the election, and printed in Miscellaneous Document No. 36, in which the evidence in this case is contained, on page 55. This letter furnishes a solution of the cause why the contestant McHenry did not receive more votes.

Speaking of a desire of the rebel States to return to submission to the Constitution, he says:

"Whenever any manifestation of such a desire on the part of the rebellious States is apparent, I am then for an armistice and a national convention; a foreign, friendly, mediating power may in such an event be necessary, in the same manner as a third party in a personal difficulty acts as a friend and mediator in bringing about a reconciliation. I have, and did in my speech at Calhoun and elsewhere suggest such a state of affairs; I did it as a mere matter of reflection and digestion on the part of the people—not urging it as a proposition that ought to be adopted by our Government, or as my position in the canvass.

"I have also urged my utter hostility to the proclamation of freedom by the President; to the arming of slaves; to the proposition of compensated emancipation in Kentucky; and all other unwarranted assumptions of power by the President.

"Such are the positions, my fellow-citizens, that I have endeavored to assume before the public. This is the head and front of my offending."

"Reporters of my speech at Calhoun have misrepresented me, and at a moment that will prove fatal to me, if I allow my name to be used in the district convention in June. The effect of this misrepresentation has been to throw off from me the support of two of the leading Union papers in Kentucky, which previously had spoken favorably of me—the Frankfort Commonwealth speaking of me as a 'rebel, no better than Breckinridge,' and the Louisville Journal republishing the article, and with many regrets recalling everything that it had formerly said in my behalf. That abolition journal, the New York Tribune, has called on General Burnside to arrest me. Public meetings have been held in counties where I had the confidence of the people, and delegates appointed to the Calhoun convention instructed to vote for any one against me. The blow has been struck and the injury inflicted, and it is now too late for me to be fairly represented in that convention; but I assure you that the injury will be repaired and mistake corrected."

He then proceeds, in closing his letter, to say:

"I respectfully decline submitting to the action of the convention, and announce myself a candidate for your consideration at the August election."

I beg not to be misunderstood. I do not cite this letter or use it for the purpose of intimating in the slightest degree that the gentleman is disloyal. I beg he will have no such understanding of my remarks. I cite it only to show what was the estimate which the people of the second congressional district of Kentucky had in relation to his position; I cite it as his own declaration that certain leading newspapers of Kentucky, papers which he himself declares had been favorable to him, turned their backs upon him, and recalled everything which they had previously said in his behalf; I cite it for the purpose of showing that a press so influential as the Louisville Journal and the Frankfort Commonwealth, which had previously been friendly to him, repudiated him, and necessarily affected the opinion of the people of his district, and to show that under the force of that sentiment those formerly friendly to him refused to sustain him at the polls; I cite it as showing that the vote he alleges he did not receive is not to be charged to the military interference or orders of General Burnside, but to the settled conviction upon the part of the people leading to a preference for the sitting member, according to the announcement of those newspapers which were most in their confidence.

I do not choose to enter upon the question of the propriety or impropriety of those orders. I have my special and particular views in relation to them; but representing as I do now the majority of the committee, and not expressing my own sentiments merely, I forbear entirely to comment upon or give expression to my opinion in regard to their propriety or legality. Waiving their consideration, a majority of the committee have come to the conclusion that the sitting member is entitled to his seat, and therefore have introduced the resolution which is now for action before the House.

Mr. McHENRY, (contestant.) Mr. Speaker, I am before my country to-day for the purpose of appealing to it, and to this House, to sustain me in the advocacy of a high principle, which you, sir, and which every lover of republican government has been taught to love and to respect since the very hour this great Government of ours first struggled for existence. I am truly thankful and feel deeply grateful to this House for the privilege that has been extended to me, as well as to other contestants, to address you, and to lay our own claims before the country. Oftentimes since the commencement of this contest have I been met with the discouraging remarks on the part of those who disagree with the policy and politics of the party which now controls the destiny of this country, as "What will it avail you, sir, to make this contest?" "Do you hope to succeed against the fanaticism which now rules the country?" "Do you think that this party will listen to your plea for an instant?" "It is time and labor lost." But, sir, I have never lost my confidence in the natural goodness of the human heart, and I hope I may never lose that high respect for the Congress of the nation which it has in all times past commanded, and which has been extended to it by the people of all nations; and it is indeed encouraging to know that the petitions of the humblest citizen of the Republic, as well as that of its proudest and mightiest, has met at all times from Congress a respectful consideration.

I have been told that no justice could be received at the hands of the controlling party of this House, by one who differed, however honestly, from it in politics; but justice is heaven-born, and cannot safely be neglected by any party that derives its power from the people, who are, at last, the final arbiters of all political questions that arise in this Government. That government of man is strongest and most likely to be perpetual which approximates most nearly to the divine. But the divine government, with the universe for its domain and this mighty earth for its footstool, has declared that not even a "sparrow" can fall to the earth without its observation. Can a Government like ours, therefore, which has been founded upon and which has at all times professed to regard the rights of the individual man, afford to slight the case of even its humblest citizen, much less one who appears and appeals to you for simple justice in the name of an outraged people, who have in all times past commanded respect and admiration for their devotion to the purest principles of government? And when I behold around me the assembled wisdom, worth, and loyalty of this mighty nation, I feel that the appeal to you of the people to save to them a great principle of government, the purity of the elective franchise, will not be made in vain.

I am here, sir, in no factious opposition to the gentleman who occupies the seat which I contest. The relations which have for years and do now exist between us are of the most intimate and amicable character. But, sir, as a freeman and an independent citizen of the Republic, and one who is entitled to its protection, I am here as the humble volunteer champion of a portion of the people of Kentucky who, seeking the protection of the Government, have found it denied to them, and, as lovers of constitutional liberty and republican freedom, when they asked their rights as citizens, have been met with indignant insults at the hands of the constituted authorities of the Government.

And I am here, as I verily believe, as the representative of a large majority of the people and legal voters of my district; and although my competitor holds the certificate of election and a majority of votes cast were for him, yet it is a well-known fact in Kentucky that this certificate and majority was obtained by preventing a fair expression of public opinion at the polls, and depriving the people of their elective franchise through fear, intimidation, threats, violence, bribery, corruption, and bloodshed. And, sir, I am here as the representative of the people to appeal to this Congress upon a principle the proper maintenance of which is far more important to the country, to my own constituents, and to myself, than any personal or political consideration which I may feel in this immediate contest.

I take occasion here to remark that I have no complaints to make toward the Committee of Elections or toward any member of it; but on the contrary desire to express my gratification and thanks to them for the patient and impartial manner in which this case has been investigated, and to the distinguished chairman of the committee, who has won me by his dignity, candor, fairness, and ability, and having carefully watched his course during the sessions of the committee in the present session, have thought it strange that any one could think otherwise than that he is a man of honor by principle, a scholar by education, and a gentleman by nature.

Among the various questions that have been presented to this House by the different cases of contested elections that have occurred since the formation of the Constitution, there have never been any that has presented the same issues to the House for its consideration as this, and similar cases presented to the Thirty-Eighth Congress. And paradoxical as it may appear, with a majority of 5,000 votes that were cast against me, I yet contend and expect to demonstrate that I am and was the choice of a large majority of the legal voters of my district. The reason why this majority was not cast for me at the polls will be made evident and manifest when the House comes to read the proof taken in this case, and see the "fantastic tricks played before high Heaven" on the "dark and bloody ground," by the minions of power in brief authority, clothed in the honored uniform of the Government, whose laws they had solemnly sworn to sustain, thrusting their bayonets between the people and the exercise of the most sacred right of an American freeman.

Not only do we behold the people prevented from voting, but every device which human ingenuity could invent is brought forward to accomplish the election of certain candidates. In many places a file of soldiers is stationed around the polls with instructions to allow no man to vote for certain candidates. In others the names of these candidates were erased from the polls, and the soldiers sent out to bring the people up to vote for those whose names remained upon the poll-book. In some places the people are informed that they can vote by taking an oath prescribed by one military commander, and at another the oath prescribed by another commander. The depositions in this case show that legal voters, after conforming to all the rules laid down by the State and military laws, were arrested after they were allowed to vote and confined in prison for voting. Some were encouraged to vote by being informed that they would be arrested if they did not vote; some that they would be arrested if they attempted or asked to be allowed to vote. Some who applied to vote and offered to take the oath prescribed by the Legislature of Kentucky and swear to support the Constitution of the United States and of Kentucky were refused and threatened with arrest if they attempted to vote again. Orders were issued from "Headquarters, District of Western Kentucky," informing the people that all those who voted for certain candidates would have preference shown them in the impressment of horses and other pauper for the use of the Government, and that the Government stood in need of the property of these people was made manifest by sending out squads of cavalry through the country to impress the horses of the elect.

Sir, I can bear defeat, oppressions, wrongs, slander, abuse, and sorrow, and I have been made the unjust victim of all this within the last few years of my life, but never have I been so grieved as when I beheld my friends persecuted, oppressed, and robbed for no other reason than that they voted, or wanted to vote, for me. I appealed to the officer charged with this pleasant duty, as it seemed to him, to spare the favorite and only horse of a friend who had voted for me, but was unheeded. I appealed to the sitting member, my competitor, to stop this outrage upon my friends, but my prayers were again unheeded, while a serene smile of secret delight and horrid pleasure flitted across his countenance as he beheld the outrage. Not satisfied with driving the people from the polls by oaths, threats, intimidation and military interference, but persecution, malicious and demon-like, must follow the few who were brave enough to exercise their rights as freemen by casting their vote as they always had done before. I desire to refer the House to the testimony of a few witnesses upon this point—W. S. Britain, Possiter, O'Brian, Whiteley, Render, and Hocker. (Miscellaneous Document, No. 36.) Not only are the peaceable, quiet citizens met upon the highway and robbed, but we behold this knight of perfection, this chosen officer of the third Kentucky cavalry, invading the sacred precincts of God's consecrated grounds, disturbing religious worship, scattering the honest people who had there collected for worship, and singing out and leading away, for the use of and in the name and by the authority of the Government, the only horse of a poor itinerant Methodist preacher, who, like his revered and honored pioneers of "God's living light" in the West, the Methodist ministry, was upon his circuit in the wilderness, "going forth into all the world and preaching the gospel to every creature." He, too, must suffer. I blush for such conduct in a Kentucky soldier, and more especially is it painful to me coming from an officer in a regiment that is a pride and ornament to our State and honored by the people of our district, as being the regiment that was organized by that gallant and lamented hero who preceded us as the Representative in this House, and who left these attractive scenes to participate in the din and clangor of arms, and who laid down his valuable life for the honor and glory of his country upon the hard-fought field of Perryville.

I beg leave here to allude to an episode in the political history of the sitting member in this case, not because I think it will have any particular bearing in this case, but to show the great injustice that has been done me, and also to vindicate myself from the charge of disloyalty that is urged against me here, and to show that the incumbent is the last one under the circumstances that ought to allude to it.

The sitting member has thought proper to charge and endeavor to prove that my political positions were disloyal, and therefore that it was not improper that the people should not be allowed to vote for me. I endeavored to introduce the deposition of a witness, whose evidence was checked up by the gentleman, objecting to the introduction of a communication in his own handwriting that I was anxious the world should see, and particularly this Congress. And here, sir, I will make the point that the examiner had no right to prevent this testimony coming before the House, which was done, thus stifling this investigation, and saying to the Congress of the nation, "You are not entitled to know anything that ever Mr. Yeaman said or did that may be considered disloyal; but everything against Mr. McHenry is admissible." This may give my friends an idea of the difficulties under which I labored in taking proof in this case. Witnesses were frightened away from the examiner's office, and many of them told me they were afraid to testify and had been warned not to give their depositions as voters had been warned not to go the polls. What right has a county court judge or magistrate to stifle the evidence that I desire to bring before this Congress, as has been done? But I will make the exposition, every word of which I am responsible for, and will not be denied. When this rebellion first began the President called an extra session of Congress, to meet July 4, 1861. We had to elect our Representatives in Kentucky, and in our district General James S. Jackson was a candidate, and among others Mr. Yeaman, on the Union side. Kentucky held at that time the position of armed neutrality, and while General Jackson was occupying the position of sustaining the Government in case Kentucky took sides, the sitting member was in any event the most ultra armed-neutrality man I ever saw; and this question was carried so far that when the division of the question of "armed neutrality" came, the people of my section found that the rebels had all the arms and we had the neutrality.

Now, as this race for Congress progressed Fort Sumter fell, and the President called for seventy-five thousand men to sustain the Government. The furor created in Kentucky by the idea of seventy-five thousand men being raised was so great that the strongest and stanchest Union men in the State weakened and many of them went clear over to the rebellion. Never shall I forget the excitement that prevailed in our county and town and in our section of the country. A large company was rapidly raised and marched south from our town; people flocked to town and an immense mass meeting was held, for the purpose of organizing the military home guards. The secessionists got hold of the meeting, and, with the wildest excitement I ever saw, passed the most violent secession resolutions. Some of our best speakers and strong Union men let down and gave the Union up as lost. My friend had given it up several days before and did not attend that meeting; if he had I think he would have started for Dixie that night. He could not stand the seventy-five thousand men at any rate, and abandoned the track as a candidate for Congress. It is said, in alluding to this meeting, that there was but one man in all that crowd that had the bravery to vote against the resolutions that carried with so much enthusiasm that night, and was only spared from violence by his age and the respect that all had for him as a citizen, and that man (my father) was said to be the only man in our county who could, without perjury, take the oath prescribed to voters at the polls by General Shackleford or Colonel Foster, who seemed to have the second district under their special charge.

After my friend had left the track for Congress, General Jackson came to our town and made a speech, taking exactly the same position that is now occupied by the Union Democracy of Kentucky, and after he had finished I pledged him my support and did everything in my power to secure his election over a man who was running upon what was called the southern rights platform, and I did support him. Not so my friend, who not only could not support General Jackson for Congress against the candidate of the secession party, but expressed himself so fiercely against the general's position of sustaining the Government by force, and regretted so much that he had left the track, that he was solicited to run as the southern rights candidate for Congress, and, in view of making the race, submitted to this committee his views; and it was this paper that I desired to introduce as evidence in this case which was ruled out. I have not the whole document, but in it will be found the following choice sentiment:

"I would allow time for reflection and reconciliation, and if then a reconstruction is impossible on the bases of consent, honor, and interest, I would have no reconstruction on the basis of force, and would rather acknowledge the independence of the southern confederacy than to urge a war of subjugation against them."

He did not run, however, and in order to heal his disappointed hopes we run him for the Legislature, and elected him over a straight-out secession candidate. The day before the election, in August, 1861, we find another exposé of his political position in the following language written for the public eye and for political purposes, and of course I commit no breach of faith in alluding to it:

August 3, 1861.

SIR: I understand it has been reported in your neighborhood that I am in favor of voting men and money to subjugate the South. I am for the Union and against secession, but have constantly gone against subjugation. I am also for defending against all attacks.

I have constantly held to the legal right of the Government to execute its laws, but that as a question of policy and statesmanship would not forcibly do so against the eleven seceded States, relying on time, reconciliation, and compromise to heal the difficulties.

G. H. YEAMAN.

This was after the battle of Manassas, after Congress had voted five hundred thousand men and $500,000,000, when the whole country was flying to arms, and Mr. Speaker, when the records will show that I was recruiting men for the Federal service and when General Jackson had determined to leave Congress and enter the field. What was the position of Congress at that time? It was when Congress had solemnly declared and

"Resolved, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern States now in revolt against the constitutional Government and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment, will recollect its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged upon our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor for the purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions in those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union with all dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

With this declaration of Congress before him, with the rebels collecting and arming by thousands all along the southern border of Kentucky for the purpose of invading and dragging our State out of the Union, when she had given a majority of 65,000 for the Union candidates, the sitting member in this case "would not vote men and money to forcibly execute the laws of the Government against the eleven seceded States." There was no cry of "negro and abolition" then. The President, indeed, had allayed all fears of that by declaring publicly to the world in his inaugural address that he "had no intention, either directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it existed; he believed he had no lawful right to do so."

But the Union people of Kentucky, seeing that a clash of war was inevitable, went forth to the young men of the State; and our public speakers rallied them to the cause of the country, and did so with this solemn declaration of Congress and pledge of the President as a text, from which they harrangued the people all over the State. And it was under this state of affairs that the people of Kentucky rallied to arms; and I speak it not boastfully when I say that I am entitled to the credit of establishing the first camp in southern Kentucky; and when General Buckner invaded the State he found Kentuckians rallying to resist him; and the first clash of arms that occurred upon Kentucky soil was between rebel soldiers from Bowling Green and Federal soldiers under my command, of the seventeenth Kentucky regiment, which regiment is now a pride and honor to the country, and whose gallant achievements and immortal dead now form a part of the history of this rebellion. And when the gallant Representative before alluded to left these Halls and published his proclamation to the people of Kentucky and to his constituents of our district to rally to the cause of the Union, the sound of his voice was like Roderick's bugle horn, "one blast of which was worth a thousand men."

There are many in this House who knew that gallant soldier, but none probably more intimately than myself; and I never shall forget his genial and social converse among his officers and friends the evening before the terrible battle of Perryville; and in parting with him for the evening and speaking of the probabilities of an engagement, he spoke with the deepest feeling and interest in regard to the approaching conflict. He had recently assumed the command of a division, and all the troops under his command were new recruits, raw and fresh, and he was too good a soldier not to feel the importance of the responsibility that rested upon him. He dreaded the idea of his division meeting the first shock of the engagement, but hoped that some older and tried troops would open the ball; and in shaking hands with me he remarked, as if in anticipation of the terrible reality that did occur the next day, "When this engagement comes off I may go down, but if I do, sir, it will be with my harness on." The very collision occurred that he so much dreaded, and he did fall in the very commencement of the engagement. He fell at the front of his division, and, sir, he did "go down with his harness on." So, also, fell the next two ranking officers of his division shortly afterwards, General Terrill, of Virginia, and Colonel Webster, of Ohio. On the following night, in a neighboring town a few miles in rear of the battle-field, where I had command, I took charge of the bodies of these three glorious heroes, and performing all the sad offices to them that was in my power, I forwarded their corpses to Louisville; and, sir, in the quiet rays of the moon which fell upon and lighted up that sad scene of death as I posted the "guard of honor" around their bodies and contemplated their well-known features, rendered terrible in the struggle in which they had died, I thought of my struggling country, of my State whose fair fields were being desolated by the fratricidal strife that was then progressing, of the happy past in connection with the departed friends that were then before me, and, in contemplating them, could but exclaim—

"Shrine of the mighty, can it be
That this is all remains of thee!"

And I still think that it was a hardship and great injustice that the soldiers of the third Kentucky cavalry should under all the circumstances have, as I have shown, thus persecute me and my friends at the last election in Kentucky.

When, in the history of this country or of political parties in the country, has it ever before been required of the citizens who desire to support a particular political ticket to take an oath to support a particular policy before they were allowed to vote, and that oath being exactly antagonistic to the principles which they desired to support at the polls? And why was it necessary, as in our district, to require the people who desired to vote for me to take an oath, when the whole "disloyal ticket," as it was called, was erased from the polls by order of the military authorities. And standing as I did upon the same political platform as my opponent, why were my friends required to take an oath not found in the laws nor in the Constitution, while those of my opponent were allowed to vote undisturbed and unchallenged?

In anticipation of this interference at the election, I urged before the people that it was wrong, illegal, and unconstitutional. I contended that Congress or the Legislature of Kentucky would immediately expel from their halls any man whom they regarded as disloyal, as they had done; that the military authorities would arrest, as they had done before, any enemy to the Government who should be elected to office. I contended and do still that the right of franchise should be held sacred and the people allowed to vote; but that it was nothing more than right and proper for the Government to refuse to allow any man to qualify for an office in a Government whose previous acts had shown that he was in favor of destroying that Government.

The Legislature of Kentucky had early in the year 1862 taken this subject into consideration and passed an act that "any citizen of the State who shall enter into the service of the confederate States in either a military or civil capacity, or into the service of the provisional government of Kentucky, and continued in it after the act took effect," should be considered as having expatriated himself, and that a person might be required to negative an oath that he had not violated this act at the polls before he could vote. This is what is called the expatriation act of Kentucky.

I never made any objection to this law and did not expect the vote of any person whom it would reach. The law was resisted, however, in the Kentucky Legislature by some of the ablest men in it on the ground that it was unconstitutional.

Had this been the only oath required at the polls it would have been the height of folly for me to have urged my claim before this House. But, sir, military men throughout the whole State prescribed oaths to suit themselves.

Twenty days before the election the Governor of the State issued a proclamation simply calling the attention of the officers of the election to the expatriation act, and "Earnestly enjoined and required a strict observance and enforcement of the act and all other laws of the State regulating elections, as being alike due to a faithful discharge of duty, to the purity of the elective franchise, and to the sovereign will of the people of Kentucky expressed through their Legislature."

This proclamation of the Governor of Kentucky was issued through the purest motives and through a sense of duty; and I have nothing to say against it.

But General Burnside takes command of the department of the Ohio fresh from his glorious victory at Fredricksburg, and, as if in spite of the whole world for the useless slaughter of thousands of gallant soldiers at that place, he immediately inaugurates a new régime in Kentucky. By his General Order No. 38 he institutes a new discipline over us. He bridle the tongue, already as silent as the grave, in Kentucky; he shuts down the lip and places a lock upon it; he stifles the freedom of speech, and seemed as if he could crush the immortal mind of man for not bowing to his sovereign will; he strikes at the affections of the human heart and drives weeping women and children from the land of their birth, because the dearest objects of their affections have been exiled by the fortunes of war. Like a midnight burglar he breaks open the door of a peaceable and unoffending citizen, drags him from the bosom of his family, and exiles him to a foreign country. These orders come upon us so thick and fast that the terror-stricken people of his department stand in awe and exclaim, as did the disciples of old at the wonders wrought by the Messiah, "What manner of man is this?" who commands these things, "that even the winds and the sea obey him?" "And lo the end is not yet," for not satisfied with the limits of his broad domain, he reaches to the cities of New York and Chicago and Cincinnati, and with a dash of his pen suppresses the freedom of the press and strikes down the liberties of the people to such an extent that the President, to his honor be it said, steps forth at last and checks the reckless career of this madman. May God in his goodness save the suffering people of Kentucky from the tender mercies of such a tyrant. His proclamation declaring martial law in Kentucky, on the 31st July, says:

"Whereas the State of Kentucky is invaded by a rebel force with the avowed intention of overawing the judges of the election, of intimidating the loyal voters and keeping them from the polls, and forcing the election of disloyal candidates at the election to be held on the 3d of August; and whereas the military power of the Government is the only power that can defeat this attempt, the State of Kentucky is hereby declared under martial law, and all military authorities are hereby commanded to aid the constituted authorities of the State in support of the laws and the purity of suffrage as defined in the late proclamation of his Excellency Governor Robinson. It is not the intention of the commanding general to interfere with the proper expression of public opinion," &c.

The reasons given by General Burnside for declaring the State under martial law were false, and the evidence in this case shows that the general knew they were false. The rebel force to which he alludes as having invaded the State were but a small band of cavalry that came into the State, as General Burnside afterwards telegraphed to General Halleck, "to make a diversion in favor of Morgan;" and this same body of cavalry were actually in retreat and out of the State before the election. This proclamation was an outrage upon the laws and established usages of the State, and has done an irreparable injury to the Union cause in Kentucky.

Three days previous to the publication of General Burnside's proclamation Colonel John W. Foster, commanding post at Henderson, in this district, issues his pronouncement upon the subject, and sends squads of soldiers with his orders into eight counties in the district, and into almost every voting precinct in those counties.

It will be seen by reference to the testimony in this case that this Colonel Foster was solicited thus to interfere in the election, and was solicited by the friends of the sitting member; that this order was gotten up and submitted to the inspection of the sitting member in this case before it was issued.

Mr. YEAMAN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the order was submitted to me before its publication?

Mr. McHENRY. That is the statement.

Mr. YEAMAN. The statement is not true.

Mr. McHENRY. It is manifest from the record that he was induced to make a mysterious visit to the town of Owensboro', where the sitting member resides, only a few days before the election. This order was issued and printed in the office of the paper published in the town and in the interest of the sitting member, and franked by him over the district only a few days previous to the election.

This officer was induced to make this mysterious visit to Owensboro', because he was solicited to do so by the friends of the sitting member. Why? Because in the language of a witness it was feared that the rebels would attempt to vote, and that the county would be carried against the sitting member. An alarm had arisen in the minds of the sitting member and his friends that he would be defeated if the people were allowed to vote; that a conspiracy had been formed to elect me; that the people would elect me; and whereas, in the language of General Burnside, "the military force of the Government is the only power that can defeat this attempt," therefore Colonel Foster, General Shackleford, and others were appealed to to save the country from the frightful conspiracy to overthrow the Government.

These two officers, both subordinate and inferior to the general commanding the department, seemed to have anticipated General Burnside's intention, and accordingly issued their orders before the proclamation of martial law; and I make a point of military law that this order of General Burnside, whether right or wrong, superseded their orders and rendered them null and void; but it is a fact that the election in the second district of Kentucky was controlled by the orders of these subordinate officers, and no attention paid by them to the orders of their superior officer. Sir, I had the misfortune of being dismissed from the Army for publishing an order to my regiment which was intended to uphold the laws of my State. These two officers are retained in the service after publishing and executing orders which were not only in violation of the laws of the State, but in disobedience of the orders of their superior and commanding officer.

By this oath and order, the soldiers at the polls and officers were required to take an oath that they "had not given any aid, assistance, or comfort to any person in arms against the Government, that they had demeaned themselves as loyal citizens in all things since the beginning of the present rebellion."

How stands General Shackleford upon this question? Here are his opinions upon the subject of this war, found in a letter written to some friends in order to explain his views upon the politics of the day. I will thank the Clerk to read the letter explaining General Shackleford's views.

The Clerk read, as follows:

MADISONVILLE, April 28, 1861.

GENTLEMEN: Yours of the 27th instant, requesting that on Monday next, at your town, I should address the citizens of Muhlenberg county upon the absorbing questions that affect the honor and destiny of Kentucky, was received this morning. I regret exceedingly that previous engagements will prevent me from complying with your wishes. For I can assure you that you judge me aright when you say you doubt not my loyalty to my native State, and that I appreciate her true position. Among the series of resolutions adopted by the two conventions that assembled at Louisville in January last you will find the following:

"Resolved, That we deplore the existence of a Union to be held together by the sword, with laws to be enforced by standing armies. It is not such a Union as our fathers intended, and not worth preserving."

The proof is now overwhelming, that if we are to have any further Union it is to be just such a Union as the two great parties in convention assembled, in January last, denounced as not being such a Union as our fathers intended, and not worth preserving. And the action of the conventions was subsequently indorsed by the members of the parties throughout the State. I ask if any member of either of the conventions, or any one who indorsed their action, can now indorse a Union to be held together by the sword, and that in the hand of Lincoln, with Black Republican laws enforced by standing armies. I answer emphatically, for one, I never will. It is nowhere to be found in the entire proceedings of the conventions that Kentucky ever contemplated any other position than that assigned her by interest, honor, and nature—and that is with the South. In proof of this I refer you to the sixth resolution, which is as follows:

"Resolved, That if this anti-slavery party should increase in strength and be able to carry out its purpose in the use of the Federal Government, the South (not that Kentucky will take a neutral position) has ample means of resistance, and is fully able at any time to resist unconstitutional aggressions," &c.

Proving conclusively that the recently discovered safety for our proud and noble Commonwealth in an "armed neutrality" was not once thought of.

In a speech I made before the Union convention, I then assumed the position that if all hope should be lost, and the issue should be an issue between the North and South, that, for weal or woe, my destiny was firmly and inevitably linked with that of my native South. That issue has been made, and I stand ready to redeem my pledge.

I have made this letter much longer than I had contemplated, but I find my apology in the intense interest I feel in these great questions. It will afford me much pleasure to meet with you on some future occasion, and address your people upon these momentous subjects.

You will please accept my warmest gratitude, gentlemen, for the complimentary manner in which you have been pleased to use my name in connection with these great interests, and of the position I occupy in the esteem of your people, whom I have ever loved.

I have the honor to remain your obedient servant,
J. M. SHACKLEFORD.

And it is a well-known fact that he commenced his military career by starting to recruit a regiment for the southern army and nearly succeeded, when he was diverted from his course and raised one, as I did, for the Federal service. The men, however, that he had raised for the rebel army went South; and I make the statement as a fact that this very man did more for the rebel cause in the early stage of the rebellion than any man in the southern portion of the State. He returned to his loyalty, and has done much to repair the injury he had effected; but I cannot see why this new-fledged loyal man could not appreciate the feelings of those who like him had strayed from their loyalty and desired to return to it, but were prevented from it by the oath prescribed by him for them to take, and his officers, placing such a construction upon it as would have disfranchised the very author of the oath and order, and which he could not have taken without perjury?

Under these circumstances, sir, I ask how was it possible to have a fair, a legal, or a constitutional election? But the gentleman contends that it was a quiet and peaceable election. Sir, it was quiet; it was a peaceable election. There never was in the history of the Commonwealth a more peaceable and quiet day in Kentucky than the 3d of August, 1863. The declaration of martial law by General Burnside in Kentucky, for the purpose of "sustaining the purity of the elective franchise," cast a pall of gloom and darkness over that State which caused peace and quiet to reign supreme that day; which hangs over it yet.

This declaration of martial law gave an unbridled license to every soldier throughout the State to set the State laws at defiance and run rough-shod over the rights of the people. On election day I visited two different voting precincts in my county; the judges at one place, both of whom were supporters of mine, told me that they were afraid to act contrary to the military orders, because the State was under martial law. At another I was boldly told that the State was under martial law, and that civil law had nothing to do with their actions. At one of these places friends of mine could only be allowed to vote by taking an oath to support the policy of the present Administration, and when I protested against it was threatened with punishment if I did not go away. It was at this place, that Crather, (page 15,) a respectable citizen of our county, testifies that he saw old men come forward to vote, offer to take any oath prescribed by the constitution or laws of the State or United States, and were driven away with tears in their eyes; tears! The human heart in its struggles must find relief, and it does so often in tears. It is not an indication of weakness to weep; it is manly to weep.

"A child may weep at a bramble's smart;
A maid to see her lover part;
But woe unto a country when
She sees the tears of bearded men."

In one instance the poll-book was taken possession of by the commanding officer of a squad of soldiers, and the election broken up, and he positively prohibited the people from voting at all. It is not necessary for me to refer the House to the various outrages which did occur, and which are in proof in this case, but simply to refer them to it, and ask of them a careful consideration of it.

The Constitution provides that each House of Congress shall be the judge of the election, qualification, and return of its own members. Now, I ask the question, was this sublime farce under which the sitting member in this case holds his seat an election? If so, was it such an election of the people as the Constitution and laws of the country intended, by which members were to be sent to this House?

The election throughout Kentucky was so much interfered with by the military as, in my opinion, to vitiate the gubernatorial election of the State. Far better had it been for our party to have elected the whole Wickliffe ticket in Kentucky than to have secured the election of our candidates by a resort to such unconstitutional, illegal, and violent means as disgraced the State of Kentucky on 3d August, 1863.

Sir, two years ago, when that aged and honorable man who was recently defeated for Governor in Kentucky, took his seat in this House as a Representative of Kentucky, no man in this House commanded more respect, and no one was more entitled to it. He was peculiarly situated. Almost all of his numerous talented and accomplished family had taken sides with the rebellion, but this sundering of family ties and affections did not affect the noble old patriot in his devotion to the Constitution and the duty which he owed to his Government, to the pure principles of which he had devoted a large portion of his life, and to the support and maintenance of which he had contributed as much as had his distinguished colleague and contemporary who has been gathered to his fathers since the adjournment of the last Congress.

Sir, there was not a Kentuckian who did not feel proud at seeing these two old men eloquent, these honored relics of the olden times, these representatives of opposite political parties, and these rival politicians of half a century, these veterans who had been called from their retirement, whether they had gone to spend the few days that were yet allotted to them in peace and quiet, called by the spontaneous voice of the people once more to assist our country in its present desperate struggle.

In obedience to that call, laying aside the prejudices of the past and thinking only of the future, they thought not of honor, of party, of conquest, of subjugation, of interfering with the rights or established institutions in the States, but of their country, their whole country, the maintaining of the supremacy of the Constitution and of sustaining the dignity, rights, and equality of the several States unimpaired.

Sir, I know not which is to be the more regretted, the actual loss of the one, or the wholesale, systematic, unjust, and villainous attempt on the part of a faction in Kentucky to tarnish and injure the fair fame and unsullied reputation of this oldest and noblest of living Kentucky patriots. If there is anything that would bring the burning blush of shame to the face of the admirer of free speech and free election—those bulwarks of constitutional government and popular liberty—it would be the insult to him at Shelbyville on the part of Federal soldiers, upon his attempting to address his fellow-citizens, by dispersing the crowd, preventing him addressing the people, and threatening to shoot him, or the still greater indignity perpetrated upon him, as a candidate, and our State, in Bardstown, on the 3d of August, 1863.

It may be asked why the defeated candidate for Governor in Kentucky did not contest his election. In answer I would say that he was debarred from it by a provision in the constitution "that the candidate receiving the highest number of legal votes given" should be declared to be elected. The contest is tried by the Legislature, and in that whole body I believe there are but three members who are political friends of Mr. Wickliffe, and as they were not allowed to vote for him as citizens at the polls, they therefore could not expect to accomplish anything for him as representatives.

The constitution of Kentucky provides that "all elections shall be free and equal," and the Constitution of the United States provides that each House of Congress shall be the judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members. It is as much your duty to uphold the constitution of Kentucky as it is to uphold the Constitution which you have sworn to support. There is no conflict between the two. In fact the one is dependent upon the other, and in taking an oath to maintain the one you necessarily take the other under your sworn protection. Then this election shall be free and equal. Now I ask this House, was it "free and equal" to scratch my name from the poll-book without any authority from me, and allow that of my opponent to remain undisturbed? Was it "free and equal" to station soldiers around the polls who challenged the votes, and drove from the polls men who desired to vote for me and no interruption offered to any one who desired to vote for him? Was it "free and equal" for military officers to issue orders only a few days before the election declaring that no man should be voted for unless he advocated certain political principles? Was it "free and equal" for the military authorities to forcibly take possession of the poll-book and take it off, and never return the book to the clerk's office, where the law says the poll-books are to be kept? Was it "free and equal" to arrest men after they had complied with all the requirements of the military and had voted for me? Was it "free and equal" for threatening to arrest men if they did vote? Was it "free and equal" for impressing the horses of men because they voted a particular ticket? Was it "free and equal" for the sitting member in this case to use the privilege granted him by this House to frank these illegal military orders to different counties in the district for the purpose of carrying his election fraudulently? Was it "free and equal" for my friends to be shot down in the street for cheering for me, while whole companies of soldiers and homeguards cheered for him unmolested? Was it "free and equal" to grant unauthorized furloughs to large numbers of soldiers with instructions that any soldier who voted for me should get no more pay, while soldiers of my former regiment who were unanimously for me were not allowed to come home? Was it "free and equal" to require an oath at the polls of voters that they would "support the policy of the present Federal Administration"? Was it "free and equal" to require one oath at one voting precinct and a different oath at another? Was it "free and equal" to close the polls before the time required by law, and thus prevent many of my friends from voting? Was it "free and equal" for General Burnside to declare martial law in Kentucky on the ground that the State was invaded by a rebel force, with the avowed intention of overawing the judges of the election, intimidating and keeping legal voters from the polls, &c., and the second day after telegraph to General Halleck that the same rebel force had left the State and had come into Kentucky for the purpose of making a diversion in favor of Morgan? Can any election thus conducted be free and equal, and can any member of this House thus stultify reason and good sense by allowing himself to come to any other conclusion than that it was, in the intention and meaning of the founders of the Constitution, no election at all, and no fairness and no equality about it? If such elections as this are "free and equal," then I beg of you to do away with the form and ceremony of the election and allow the general commanding the department to save the people the expense and trouble of an election, but let him designate and appoint the individuals whom he desires for the various offices, and so far as my district is concerned I assure you that a majority of the people will be as satisfactorily represented as they are at the present time.

There is another provision in the constitution of Kentucky providing that the privilege of the right of suffrage shall be supported by laws regulating elections, and "prohibiting, under adequate penalties, all undue influences thereon from bribery, tumult, and other improper practices." Now, certainly the spirit of this provision would show a disposition on the part of the founders of the State constitution not to have any such elections as the one to which I object—an evident desire to protect the purity of the elective franchise so as to bring out a free and unbiased expression of public will. While the Legislature of Kentucky has very properly provided for punishing persons guilty of the violation of the laws regulating the elections, qualifications of voters, &c., yet it makes no provision that the validity of the election shall in any manner be affected. I made an unsuccessful attempt to induce the judiciary in my district to take this matter in hand, and appealed to the judge to instruct the grand jury to indict such persons who had interfered with the elective franchise, and who had refused to allow legal and qualified voters to exercise this right; but upon my attempting to make a statement to the grand jury, I found that the friends of my opponent had been ahead of me, and had nearly succeeded in inducing the grand jury to indict me, because I had protested against the outrage that was being committed against the laws of the land by virtue of the order of his most royal highness "Colonel John W. Foster, commanding post at Henderson."

Yes, sir, to such a system of terrorism have we been reduced in Kentucky, that even the high judges of the court, whose duty is simply to expound the law and say to the civil officers of the State, Ita lex scripta est, are forced to yield to this higher law of a temporary military commander, as if it was a settled question of years as the law of the land.

These threats, military orders, the appearance of soldiers at the polls, had the effect to drive men from my support who would otherwise have voted for me; others were deterred from voting by the knowledge that they would be required to take an illegal oath, or would be insulted or prevented from voting if they even attempted. (See Blair's deposition.)

An instance well known in our county will illustrate the influence under which the people acted on that day.

The gentleman contends that all the rebels voted for me; but there is a case notorious in our county where one of the most influential and notorious rebels in the precinct in which he lives told a Union man that his horses would be impressed if he voted for McHenry; that he, the rebel, would vote for Yeaman; and a short time after, when this Union man's horse was taken because he voted for me, the rebel reminded him of the neighborly warning he had given him, and said, "I was smart enough to save my property; I voted for Yeaman."

Sir, it is unnecessary for me to proceed any further in mentioning instances which show the manner in which the election in the second district of Kentucky was conducted. It is a fact as well known to the country as it is that there is a contest about it.

It may be asked, why is it that other contestants from Kentucky are not here also contesting their seats? Had any of the distinguished gentlemen who were candidates in Kentucky at the last election thought proper to lay this matter before you, I would have been satisfied. But I presume that in no part of Kentucky was the military interference so great as to vitiate the whole election, as in the first and second districts. The gentleman in the first district had been arrested for being a candidate and advocating different political views from Colonel Foster, and there was no reason why he could not be arrested for contesting his election. But, sir, there is one thing I have never feared, and that is to be arrested by any order from the Government. I have done too much for my country in this struggle for the charge of disloyalty to be maintained against me; and as one who feels that he is discharging a solemn duty, I have laid this matter before you, under the clear and solemn conviction that had the election in Kentucky been held in accordance with the laws and usages of the State, I believe honestly, and will till my dying day, that I would have been triumphantly elected.

I propose now briefly to allude to the "facts, laws, and principles" upon which the sitting member in this case "claims and rests the validity of his election." He says:

1. The election was held and conducted according to the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State of Kentucky.

I have shown that it was not, and I have also shown that the Constitution and laws of the United States and of Kentucky were ruthlessly violated and trampled under foot; that there was no attention paid to either the laws of the Federal Government or of Kentucky. This statement is in such palpable contradiction of facts as they existed that I will say no more about it.

2. The election was free, fair, open, and untrammelled, and was a free and deliberate expression of the electors in the district in the selection of a Representative in the Congress of the United States.

I suppose there is no one who has thought enough of this subject to give his attention to the evidence in this case can agree with the gentleman that this election was "free, fair, open, and untrammelled." The election, I admit, was perfectly "free, fair, open, and untrammelled" to any one who wanted to vote for him, but it was a very different thing when a voter desired to cast his vote against the gentleman. It was all right so far as he was concerned. He or any of his friends will probably never complain of the manner in which the election was conducted. I have never been a candidate for a political office before this, sir, and I sincerely hope I may never be elected by such a free and deliberate expression of public opinion as that by which the gentleman holds his seat. I never desire my political, professional, or personal promotion to be obtained at the sacrifice of law, of order, of principle, or the liberties of the people. I do not desire to ride into office by crushing out a fundamental principle of republican government. I do not desire to have my fellow-citizens insulted at the polls, forsooth, because they do not choose to vote for me, nor would I have my friends drive old men away from the polls with tears in their eyes because they claimed their right to vote as they always had in times before. Sir, I do not wish, I would not have, I would not hold a seat in Congress if I had to do it by crushing out these cherished principles of American freemen, for I think that there must be in store some thunderbolt.

"Red with uncommon wrath to blast the man Who owes his greatness to his country's ruin."

The loyal people of Kentucky, to which I have always belonged, have since the commencement of this struggle and in all times past clamored for the Constitution, regarding it as the sheet-anchor of our hopes and of our salvation; they still cling to it, and bend over it with all the affection and devotion of a fond mother over her child when she beholds the numbered moments of its life are passing away. Is it to be wondered at then that you, the assembled wisdom and deputed Representatives of the States, are called upon, as you now are, to save us from the impending wreck and destruction that these outrageous violations of fundamental principles are sure to bring upon us? And where will be the sitting member from the second district when he beholds crumbling around him the liberties and rights of the people whom he claims to represent? When this general chaos and confusion is brought upon us by these gradual encroachments of arbitrary power of which he is now the willing representative, he will startle and cower before the indignant frown of the goddess of liberty as the guilty Macbeth did before the ghost of Banquo, and exclaim—

"Never shake thy gory locks at me, Thou canst not say I did it."

3. A majority of all the votes cast were for him. This is one of his grounds, and it is one which I frankly confess is true. And the strangest and most unaccountable thing in this whole matter is that his majority was not greater than it was. In good old times in Kentucky when the question was asked of a defeated candidate, "Why were you not elected?" the answer invariably was, "Simply because I did not get as many votes as my opponent did." Now, when the question is asked, it is answered as in this case, "Sir, the reason why I was not elected was because my friends were not allowed to vote; they were driven away from the polls at the point of the bayonet."

4. A majority of all the voters in the district cast their votes for him.

It is a great deal easier matter to make a statement than it is to prove it. This statement is not founded either upon facts or figures. It is founded upon fable and has its origin in the fertile brain of the gentleman. Let us look at the facts: There are twelve counties in the second congressional district. By the auditor's report for the State of Kentucky, there were in the counties composing the second congressional district white males over twenty-one years old: for the year 1861, 21,171; for the year 1862, 19,387; for the year ending October 10, 1863, 20,274. It is fair to presume that out of this last number there were 19,500 white males in the district over twenty-one years old who were entitled to vote, yet there were cast in the district, in this election, only 11,398 votes, of which the sitting member received 8,311, and the contestant 3,087, leaving a deficit of 8,102 votes that were actually in the district at the time that were not polled.

The evidence taken in the case relates only as to the election in six counties, which is half the number of counties in the whole district. The auditor's report for 1862 shows that there were in the second district 19,387 white males over twenty-one years old. The soldiers who had left their homes and gone into the Federal Army, and the soldiers who had gone off south, are not to be taken from this number because they are not counted in it. They were not reported by the commissioners of tax for 1862 or 1863, because they are by law specially exempt from poll-tax.

According to the law the number of legal voters are officially reported from each county in Kentucky once in every eight years. The last report was in 1857, when we had 19,363. The annual report of the assessors of tax for 1862 makes 19,387, showing that there had been only 24 more voters in 1862 than there were in 1857, when it is a notorious fact that the second congressional district of Kentucky has improved in her agricultural products and increased in population probably more in proportion than any other district in Kentucky. It is evident, therefore, that the large number of voters who had left the district are not taken into account in these figures, and the statement made by the gentleman that he received a majority of all the votes in the district is simply absurd.

There were four regiments recruited in this district, namely: the seventeenth, eleventh, and twenty-sixth infantry, and third cavalry, with portions of the twenty-seventh infantry and eighth and twelfth Kentucky cavalry. Now, it is in evidence charged and proven that hundreds of soldiers from these regiments were furloughed home, and did go home, all of whom voted against me. We hear of them coming home by hundreds under command of their field officers under arms, intimidating the people, giving three cheers for Yeaman, as if he was one of the heroes of this war; and at another place we see the soldiers instructed by their colonel that "if they voted for me they would get no more pay," when he (the colonel) knew at the time he said it that it was false.

All the soldiers from these regiments who could possibly be spared were sent home, and under a false impression were induced to cast their votes against me. There was an informal and unofficial election held that day by a regiment which at that time was in the front, in sight of the enemy, in front where it has ever been when danger was near, in front where it was on the frozen hills at Donelson, in front where it was at Shiloh during the long and tedious hours of that terrible day, resisting the steady but deadly advance of the enemy before the disheartened and dispirited army of Grant was reinforced by the glorious "army of the Ohio;" it was from this gallant regiment that I heard of an election held and a vote taken with no outside pressure to bear upon them, but an election where each man voted as he chose, and out of over six hundred votes I am credibly informed the sitting member in this case received only nine votes. The regiment to which I allude was the seventeenth Kentucky volunteers, and I have not the slightest doubt that if that regiment, which I formerly had the honor to command, had been allowed to come home, and were subjected to the same influences that those soldiers were who did come home, I have no doubt that their votes would have been cast unanimously against me. I mention this merely to show the "freedom and fairness" of the election for which the gentleman contends.

But I was, as the charges state, "in complicity in an unlawful scheme, in a political combination, to place the State of Kentucky in political and military antagonism with the Government of the United States; that I sought the votes of rebels, and nearly all the votes I got were rebels, rebel sympathizers, and secessionists," and that the rebels expressed preference, &c.

Sir, we approach now the discussion of a point upon which I have been told that this contest may hinge. It is not necessary for me to discuss the question or explain the political combination which the gentleman charges was gotten up for the purpose of placing the State of Kentucky in political and military antagonism with the Government of the United States. The convention which met in Frankfort on February, 1863, which was broken up and dispersed by Colonel Gilbert, may have had that object in view. There was no man who had previously been recognized or identified with the Union party of Kentucky that had anything to do with that meeting. It was a meeting of the first-class secessionists and disunionists of the State who were there assembled. The Wickliffe party of Kentucky had no more to do with it than did this House. There is no intelligent man in our district, or in Kentucky, who noticed the contest in our district but remembers my political positions, which were published in the public press and sent in circulars and handbills all over the district. They have been spread before this House. I am upon record, and do not propose to retreat from those positions; and the gentleman well knows that our canvass was made upon those principles. This circular was issued long before the political combination of which he speaks was brought to light.

I had no fear of the leading men of Kentucky known as the supporters of Mr. Wickliffe. The principles of that party are the same as those that are maintained by many of the most distinguished and influential members of this House. Differing with them only as to "a vigorous prosecution of the war," I have the highest respect for the loyalty, honesty, patriotism, and love for the Constitution which characterizes the party known as the peace Democracy of the country—and to this party the Wickliffe and Harney (who were the leaders of the Douglas Democracy) party of Kentucky belonged.

But all his party voted for me, and all the rebels, rebel sympathizers, and secessionists voted for me. The question is, What is a rebel? Who are the rebel sympathizers? It would be well for Congress or for the Government to define by resolution, by order, or by an additional article of war the meaning of the word rebel, and also give out to the world the meaning of the words loyalty and disloyalty. It is time for a revised edition of our acknowledged lexicon to be issued. There are thousands of men in Kentucky who would like to know what is meant by a loyal man and a disloyal man. I thought I was a loyal man. I have endeavored always to be so according to my interpretation of the word. I had no idea that I was anything else until I find in looking over the testimony in this case that I was, in the classic language of an officer of the third Kentucky cavalry, a "d—d rebel," and that any man who voted for me was "disloyal."

There were different interpretations to these words given by military men and officers of the election at the polls, August 3, 1861. No rebel or disloyal man could vote, and this included all those who had been placed under bonds and taken the oath; all those who had even subscribed to an oath on the back of the military passes that were issued at every military post, which included probably three fourths of the whole population of the State. This was the definition of disloyalty at one precinct in Muhlenburg county in our district: all those who had ever given any aid or assistance to the rebels, when by the deposition of Mr. Sutherland he says he applied to vote and offered to take an oath that he had given no voluntary aid or assistance, but had contributed about three thousand dollars to the rebels when he could not help it; the practicing physician who under the call of humanity, or the Christian under the teachings of his religion, charitably administered to the necessities of a dying rebel soldier who had fallen at his door, or that large class of individuals in Kentucky who had fed the hungry but errant and rebellious son who had wandered from his loyalty and returned to old Kentucky, his home, to catch a glimpse of the old folks as he was passing by; and the hundreds of non-combatants in Kentucky who had been forced to furnish food and lodging to guerrillas and rebel soldiers whether they wanted to do so or not. All this class of persons fell under the ban of disloyalty and were called rebel sympathizers, and excluded from the polls.

This suspicion of disloyalty appeared to have fallen at the polls upon all those whose near relatives have joined the rebel cause; but the distinction was invidious; for if it were not, then the charge of disloyalty might be maintained against almost every man who claims Kentucky as his native State. It would fall heavily upon my friend, the incumbent in this case, whose nearest and dearest blood-relations have taken sides against the Government. It would fall upon me, sir. It would fall upon other Representatives from Kentucky in this Hall; and if such were the case it would convict of high treason some of the most prominent and leading Union men of our State.

This is indeed one of the most terrible and trying ordeals to which the loyal heart of Kentucky is subjected, this struggle between affection and patriotism, between love and duty, between the heart and head, between the ties of consanguinity and the love of country. The immutable laws of nature are fixed and cannot be changed. You cannot crush the affections, for in doing so you would stifle Divinity itself.

All those men who were not for a vigorous prosecution of the war or who were opposed to men and money were counted disloyal in many places and not allowed to vote.

And, to crown all, those who would not take an oath to support the policy of the present Administration were not allowed to vote as being disloyal.

These are some of the classes of men who come under the scope of "rebels, rebel sympathizers, and secessionists," alluded to in the notice of the gentleman.

2. I notoriously sought the rebel vote of the district.

All the so-called rebel voters in my district are opposed to the war. They voted for me with the full understanding that I was a war man and in favor of a vigorous prosecution of it. We have gone too far in Kentucky with this war to think of stopping it now, and we could not do it if we wanted to. If we do not whip the rebels they will whip us. If we do not save the Union they will dissolve it. If we do not sustain our Government and the Constitution upon which it is founded, they will overthrow and destroy it. And as long as a bayonet gleams in the hands of a Federal soldier and the stars and stripes wave over him, I am for sustaining him with "the last man and the last dollar." We have in Kentucky gone too far in this war to retreat from it. Our fifty-five thousand soldiers who have fought under the banner of our country and in the cause of the Union must be sustained. They are an institution in our State that cannot be overlooked, ignored, nor neglected. It is now with us a matter of life and death. It has, I may say, assumed a personal character in Kentucky in which every man feels that he has taken his position and will not abandon it.

But as to the rebels voting for me. There is one great reason why every one in the district would have cast his vote for me in preference to the gentleman, all other matters being equal, and that was that I was dismissed from the Army for standing up for a principle which they as well as the majority of the Union men approve and admire; and they thought by my election to Congress that the Administration party would be rebuked, and that one of the great principles which every slave State adheres to would be maintained and sustained by the people.

I am glad to have an opportunity of explaining this matter before my country and to the people. It is a well-known fact that the Republican party as well as the President in the beginning of this war disclaimed any intention of interfering with the institution of slavery in the States where it existed. In fact the President said in his inaugural address that he "had no purpose, directly or indirectly, to do so, and believed he had no right to do so if he had." This assurance, together with the resolution of Congress known as the Crittenden resolution, gave every assurance to the people of the border slave States, and, I may say, saved Kentucky to the Union. The revocation of General Fremont's freedom proclamation in Missouri by the President was another guarantee that such was not the policy of the Government. And under these circumstances was it that the people of the border slave States rushed to arms. All those acquainted with the feeling of the border slave States will agree with me in saying that if Mr. Lincoln in his inaugural address had laid down the policy to be pursued by the Administration in the prosecution of this war that now controls it—that of setting the slaves free in the South, of placing arms in their hands and turning them loose upon innocent women and children, and of taking the slaves of the people, even the loyal people in the border States, against their will, and to say, as he had in his last message, that this course would not be deviated from—I honestly believe that Kentucky, instead of having now fifty-five thousand men in the Federal Army, would have had one hundred thousand men in the southern army.

Kentuckians did not go into this war to fight the institution of slavery. We have no prejudice against it, and we are not responsible for it. Slavery is in the Constitution of the country; we did not place it there, and the only way to get it out, or at least the only proper way, is to change that Constitution as it is provided by the instrument itself it shall be changed. I have always thought that the dissolution of the Union was a sure way to abolish the State of Kentucky, and that was one reason why I was opposed to a dissolution. It is not necessary to discuss this point here. When this rebellion commenced every man in our section of the State who said he was a Union man was denounced by the secessionists as an abolitionist. There was scarcely one but denied the charge and repudiated the idea, and they still do. The public presses of the State, the Legislature, the Governor of the State, the whole people, I may say, still repudiate it; and now, after all these solemn pledges made to the people, to our own consciences, to the world, indeed, it is terrible that we should now be called upon to violate those pledges and principles by the Government and are denounced as disloyal if we do not. It is terrible indeed that all those gallant soldiers who have from Kentucky been periling their lives for the preservation of the Union and the Constitution of our fathers, should at this late day, after all the precious blood that has been shed in their defense, be called upon thus to belie the time-honored principles of our statesmen and of our Commonwealth in dread of such a frightful alternative.

There was in my opinion one period in the history of the rebellion when this war could have been stopped and the Union restored upon a constitutional basis gloriously and harmoniously to the whole nation and to the world. My opinion is founded from my idea of the public sentiment of the South by a free intercourse and conversation with the people and prisoners of the southern States whom I freely mingled with for the purpose of ascertaining their sentiments. It was immediately after the series of disasters that followed each other in rapid succession in the early part of the year 1862. First Fort Henry fell, then Fort Donelson went down with a terrible crash which caused a panic throughout the South. The battle of Mills Spring was fought which resulted disastrously to the rebel prospects in Kentucky. Bowling Green was evacuated. Kentucky was set free. Nashville fell an easy prey to our victorious armies. The beautiful city of Clarksville was surrendered. Columbus Memphis, and Island No. 10, gave up the struggle. The rebel army retreated from Manassas, and a panic for the first time fell upon the citizens of the rebel capital. The leaders of their disheartened armies seeing the state of affairs rushed to the contest. The great battle of Shiloh was fought; they are again foiled and fall back upon Corinth to make a final stake, but soon abandon that stronghold. The whole of Tennessee was reclaimed to the Union; and finally—the most terrible blow of all—New Orleans, the great metropolis and emporium of the South, capitulated, and the old flag was raised upon the spires of that beautiful city.

Sir, I believe as a Christian man if the President of the United States had at that time gone forth with a proclamation of amnesty to the misguided people of the South, guarantying to them the full protection of the Government in the enjoyment of the domestic and State institutions, that the great mass of the people would have risen up as one man and compelled their leaders to abandon their mad scheme of dissolution and destruction. But the golden moment was lost; and now, under the present amnesty proclamation, with its provisos and oaths and exemption exception threats and insecurities, I cannot see how any intelligent southern man can look upon it in any other light than as an insult added to injury.

When General Buell's army separated from that of General Grant at Corinth and moved toward Chattanooga, it marched through a fertile and beautiful section of country. No damage was done to the people on the march, much to their surprise; not near so much, we were assured, as had been done by the rebel army under Beauregard. Not a private premise was invaded, no fences burned, no property stolen or impressed, no arrest made among the people, no insults offered to or imagined by them; scarcely a blade of grass was trampled upon or a flower plucked by the roadside; but we moved through the country a thorough, a magnificent, and beautiful system of military science.

When General Bragg invaded Kentucky in the fall of 1862, it was my fortune to command a regiment in pursuit of him, and to be placed in a brigade and division that had not been with General Buell, and of course had not been subjected to the same system and discipline to which I have alluded; but on the contrary, had been under the command of an officer of foreign birth who, it appears, had inaugurated in his field an entirely different system of warfare, that of destruction and desolation; and it was a source of continual annoyance and an absolute feeling of shame and degradation to us to notice day after day, and night after night, continued and repeated acts of lawlessness and depredation committed by these fellow-soldiers upon the people of Kentucky as we passed through that State; many of whom, indeed, were the intimate friends, relations, neighbors, and associates of the men of the regiment which I had the control of. There were hundreds of fugitive slaves in our army. They were under no military restraint, but running loose and wild under the first flush of their freedom. The army had been upon half rations for three weeks; these negroes were not counted in the returns of the regiment, and we of course could not draw rations for them. They consequently had to depredate upon the country, which they did, and the soldiers would in many instances get the credit of it. They would steal horses, mules, or anything that came in the way; they would fill up the ambulances and wagons, while the poor soldier could be seen every moment falling and fainting by the wayside; they would entice the slaves of loyal men away, carry them to some regiment that would protect them from recapture. And thus were we continually annoyed with these "free Americans of African descent," not knowing at what hour a terrible battle would take place. Every day we were appealed to by some loyal citizen of the State, old acquaintances, friends, to assist them in recovering their slaves that had been enticed away and were hiding about and skulking in the army.

The statute laws of Kentucky say that any free white male who shall be found guilty of harboring a slave shall be confined in the penitentiary for not less than two nor more than twenty years. And, sir, I contend that any commanding officer of a regiment who allows a fugitive slave to come into his camp and refuses to give him up to his owner upon application, is guilty of harboring that slave, and therefore commits a penitentiary offense. Taking this view of the matter, I issued an order to my regiment, the substance of which was that any fugitive slave which came into the camp of the regiment which I commanded would be given up to his owner upon application, whether that owner was loyal or a rebel. For this order I was summarily dismissed from the Army without trial, and without being allowed the privilege of even an explanation. If I was wrong then the whole Legislature of Kentucky was wrong, for it was heartily and fully indorsed by the Legislature. So was it also approved by the Governor of Kentucky in an official message as being "right in itself, and in accordance with the clearest dictates of a sound and enlightened policy." The whole people of the State indorsed it; the press indorsed and approved it; and the rebels of the district, as they are called, would have voted for me on this account without my seeking their votes. For this I was dismissed, while another man who had never fought a battle, a foreigner, who was tried by a court-martial and convicted of "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman," stealing and abducting slaves, was not only reinstated but promoted. Cases of individual wrong have been frequent in this war; but in comparing the action of the Government in my case to that of the other case to which I alluded I have always thought it was a great outrage, and still think so.

When we turn with despair and search and pray that some great arbiter may rise up to allay the terrible strife that is now defuging our country with fratricidal blood, we are forced to admit that in this great republican Government of ours we can look alone to that source from whom all power in this nation is derived, the people; for there is an undercurrent of truth, of godlike charity and honesty in the great heart of the American people, that manifests itself, not by the effervescing passion of mob or excited public assemblages, nor among those striving amid the din and clash of arms, but it manifests itself upon the trembling lip of the Christian philanthropist when he communes alone with his God and asks that he may be led in the paths of righteousness. I have an abiding faith and confidence in the honesty of the American people, and I appeal to them, as I did with confidence to the people of my district, to sustain me in my efforts to serve them, my State, and my country. I do not ask of this House to grant me the seat occupied by the present incumbent as the Representative from our district. He has said that he has every confidence in the people, and ought therefore to be willing to risk his chances in their hands when they can come forward and vote according to law and not according to the mere dictum of one who knows nothing of their wants, their wishes, or their desires. Turn this election back to the people with the instruction that in accordance with the Constitution and the ancient law and usage of the land "it shall be free and equal." It is all that I ask, and all that the people desire. Sir, I plead for the suffering people of Kentucky. Go see her desolated households, her fair fields, but a few years before teeming with the rich products of a fertile soil, now covered with brambles and briars, her dwellings and granaries deserted and empty, her rich gardens given up to the wild flowers, her population driven in many instances from their homes, and the torch of the incendiary applied to all their worldly goods. No longer do we see the cheerful smile and the countenance beaming with joy and prosperity, but death, gloom, and sorrow you will find at the door of every man's household. The secessionists and enemies of our Government who are responsible for the inauguration of this state of affairs, have long since departed from the State, and the men, women, and children who are left behind, look now to the Government which has protected us so long, and to the proper enforcement of the laws under the Constitution, as the only thing that can save us from an eternal anarchy. And how anomalous is her position compared with other States of this Union. Her devotion to the Constitution and to fixed principles has in this case been made the means whereby she has been deprived of her rights under that Constitution. Suspected by the Federal Government, derided and scoffed at by leading traitors who would have ruined her irretrievably, her strong arm weakened by the exit of her fifty-five thousand soldiers who have left her to maintain and uphold our Government, weak and powerless, prostrate and bleeding, the first-born of this nation, she is denounced as disloyal, ay, sir, from these very Halls.

There was a time when the step of a Kentuckian was as free and proud as that of the bounding deer upon its native hills. It was not the sky above us, for the "same blue arch that hangs over us and the same pure stars that we have loved to watch, and that blossom at twilight's gentle hour" are the admired wonder of the world. It is not the soil upon which we tread, for far richer soils may be found under the sun. It is not the mild winds that whistle around and about, for the "spicy breezes that blow so soft o'er Ceylon's isle" pass to a neighboring island laden with their rich perfume to whet the appetite and fan the cheek of the cannibal and savage; but it was because we felt that we were standing in the midst of a mighty, prosperous, and glorious nation, secure in the enjoyment of liberty, happy in the pursuit of our daily avocations, upon terms of equality and friendship with every one, protected at all times by the Government which we respected and obeyed. "From the center all round to the sea" we were the envied and honored of all. Deprive her gallant people now of this right of elective franchise and you crush her to the earth. The people of Kentucky in such a degradation would rather have no representation in this Hall, if they are not allowed to say by "a free and equal election" who their Representatives shall be. We want no dictation from military quarters as to who we must vote for; we want no political platform of principles laid down for us by persons who have no sympathy in kind with the cherished principles of the people. The large and lucrative revenue now flowing into the Treasury of the Government arising from the taxes imposed upon her products entitle our people to an equal enjoyment of the laws and Constitution of the Government. "Taxation without representation" was the great principle upon which achievement of our independence as a nation was effected. I ask the Representatives of those old States whose early heroes fell in the great struggle for American independence, are you now ready to violate that sacred principle handed down to you by your fathers as relics of the past that are to be treasured and guarded inviolable?

I need not invoke the aid of the Representatives of those great and mighty sister and neighboring States of the West to sustain us in this contest for principle and right. I urge here no personal claim for your consideration, but I speak for a whole people, a whole district, a whole State. I urge the claim of that people for the right to choose her own Representative in accordance with her own laws, and to elect their Representatives to the national councils as you have been elected. We have a common destiny in the West. Whatever may be the fate of this Union, the union which binds us together can never be dissolved. "What God has joined together let not man put asunder." Adopt this principle of depriving people of their elective franchise in Kentucky, and you know not how soon it may fall upon you also. But if you determine to do so—if the blow must fall, and this sacred right is to be violated, and Kentucky is to be made the example in the establishment of this principle—I would request in her behalf, in the language of a distinguished man upon a similar occasion before this House, "that you blot from the spangled banner of this Union the bright star that glitters to the name of Kentucky, but leave the stripe as an emblem of her degradation."

And, sir, it is charged against me as a great crime by the gentleman, in his response to my notice of contest, that I urged the people, in our canvass before them, to stand firm to their principles, and "fight North, South, East, or West against the tide of fanaticism that rolled against her," and that I said, "let Kentucky go when she might, I would go with her." Sir, I confess the sentiment, and here repeat it:

"Lives there a man with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land?"

I would be unworthy of the name of a Kentuckian did I forget her glorious history; the early struggles of our ancestors with the savage, which gave it the name of the "dark and bloody ground," and beneath whose surface now sleep these honored and glorious heroes whose deeds have given a name imperishable to our Commonwealth. I love my native State, and I will not abandon her, and I will abide her fortunes whatever they may be. I love her gallant sons and beautiful women. In childhood I sported upon her hill-sides, slept beneath her shades, laved in her streams, and fished in her brooks.

"Land of the brown heath and shaggy wood,
Land of the mountain and the flood,
Land of my sires, what mortal hand
Can er' unite the sacred band
That binds me to thy native strand?"

Mr. VOORHEES took the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. WADSWORTH, who said: Mr. Speaker, I would not have troubled the House at this time with any observations upon this contest except for the reason that I cannot give my vote in silence for the sitting member. I agree with almost, if not quite all, that my gallant friend (Mr. McHenry, the contestant) has said in denunciation of the interference with the freedom of elections by the military force of the Federal Government. I agree with him in condemning and denouncing the military orders issued to the State of Kentucky prior to the last congressional and State election; and particularly the orders reported by the Committee of Elections from subordinate Federal officers in the second congressional district. I deny that they had any legal power to issue such orders. The orders of Colonel Foster, of General Shackleford, and of General Burnside were all illegal, arbitrary, unconstitutional, and dangerous to the liberties of the people of the whole country. These orders (except, indeed, that of General Burnside) say to the officers of election, appointed under the laws and constitution of Kentucky, that none but a particular description of individuals should be candidates for office; and that none but this class of persons should vote for any candidate for office. They say that not only all voters shall be "loyal men," leaving it to some "petty, petting officer" of the Federal Government to say who is a "loyal man," but they say that no man shall be a candidate for office, or shall vote, who is not in favor of voting men and money to carry on the war. Why, sir, what man is there who will claim that such an order as that was legal? If we concede that military officers have the right to determine who shall be a candidate for office, to prescribe the qualifications of candidates for office, and, above all, to say that he shall be in favor of the war, we transfer the question of peace or war from the legislative forum to the Army, and the Army will have it in its power to perpetuate the war forever against the will of the people. Of such a character are the orders of Colonel Foster and General Shackleford. You will find them in the report of the majority of the Committee of Elections. I beg to read a single sentence from the order of Colonel Foster:

"No one will be allowed to offer himself as a candidate for office, or be voted for at said election, who is not in all things loyal to the State and Federal Governments, and in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war for the suppression of the rebellion."

Thus, sir, inferior officers of the Army undertake to determine the question how long the war shall last, and by physical force obstruct every man from voting or being a candidate who is in favor of terminating the war. Could there be anything more flagrantly illegal in principle, arbitrary, and tyrannical? Is not the civil power entirely subordinated to the military, if we concede this usurpation?

Now, sir, in common with the colleagues from Kentucky with whom I act on this floor, condemning as I do this illegal and arbitrary exercise of military power in the second congressional district of Kentucky, they would not vote, and I should not vote as I expect to vote, in favor of my colleague, the sitting member, if I were satisfied that these orders had influenced the election to such an extent as to give him a majority of the whole vote of the district. We are satisfied that he is the choice of that district, we are satisfied that the party which nominated him, and to which both the gentleman contesting (Mr. McHenry) and the sitting member belonged, had an indisputable control of the district on any fair test, and that the orders were impertinent and unnecessary. We are satisfied that the sitting member received a majority of all the votes of the district, and that that majority was not due to the moral effect of these orders, nor the disgusting military wrongs perpetrated in portions of the district. We believe that he would have obtained a majority in that election if these orders had never been issued; I think he would have received a larger majority; at least I am warranted in coming to that conclusion from my own experience in the same canvass, and belonging, as I do, to the same political organization, pledged to the same unequivocal platform of opposition to the radical measures of the Administration, of opposition to the Republican party, to a war for the negro, but in favor of the war for the Union; the same platform to which every member of this Congress from Kentucky was pledged, and upon which all of them were elected. I am satisfied from my own experience, and from the result in my own district, that if the proclamation of martial law had not been made a larger vote would have been cast and a larger majority given for most of the Union Democratic candidates. The only effect of that unnecessary order was to discourage a full vote, and rob the success of the Union party of all moral weight with the country. I confess that the most objectionable feature to me in this case is the seeming indorsement which my colleague gave to the military order by franking it to different parts of his district. But we do not know what he wrote with the orders which he thus franked, or under what peculiar circumstances he was led to do so. I would fain hope and believe that he sent them to some manly and intelligent citizens of his district, calling their attention to the interference of the military in the election in Kentucky, and requesting them to use their influence to counteract it. But I do not believe that that order increased his majority. I know that he received a majority compared with any vote hitherto cast in that district, and that fact will control my vote, although I am dissatisfied with his seeming indorsement of these military orders.

Mr. YEAMAN. It is not proved in the evidence that I franked any of these orders, and yet it is interpolated into the minority report in this case.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I beg my colleague's pardon; I have misunderstood the reports from the committee.

Mr. YEAMAN. My recollection is that I sent two or three of them, not exceeding three, at the request of citizens of other counties who happened to be in my town at the time; and I sent them without comment and without request.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to hear from this explanation of my colleague that he sent them upon request from a few friends without indorsing them; and he will recollect that I did not affirm that he had given these orders any indorsement, but only seemed to do so.

Mr. YEAMAN. Of course I recollect that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On the contrary, I was trying to insinuate what I would fain hope and believe to be the fact, that my colleague did not approve of them. I do not know how any Kentuckian could approve this arbitrary interference with the action of the people of his State on so great and solemn an occasion as an election for Governor and Legislature, and Representatives in Congress. It would be a surrender of the dignity, rights, and independence of the State to Federal usurpation.

There is another feature Mr. Speaker, from which I must express my dissent. Our gallant Kentucky soldiers came home and voted. God bless them and shield them everywhere! They had a right to come home and vote. Long may that right remain with them and the rest of their fellow-citizens unobstructed, and unpolluted! What was the influence on the mind of the soldier of these orders of his superior officers? Could the gallant soldier vote freely with orders of that description hanging over him? Could he, when he saw his superior officer interfering with the election and aiming his interference at a particular candidate, be supposed to vote freely?

Mr. A. MYERS. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. A. MYERS. These soldiers, about whom the gentleman is proposing to speak, did they vote for the candidate or for the sitting member?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand that they voted for the sitting member; at least in great part.

Mr. A. MYERS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will vote for him, too.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I know whom the gentleman would vote for if he were in my State. I could pick out the men he would vote for. He would vote for the men who stay at home and lie a-bed and loll about and prate of "putting down the rebellion," and taint with their vile breath the loyalty of gallant Union soldiers like my friend, (Mr. McHenry,) who stood boldly in the storm of battle at Donelson and Shiloh, watering the soil with his blood.

Mr. McHENRY. I aver, and have proven, that these soldiers were sent home under a misapprehension; and in some instances they were told by the commanding officer that if they voted for me they would not be allowed their money. It has been also stated that men of my own regiment were not allowed to come.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the soldiers should have voted for my colleague, the sitting member. He was the regular nominee of the Union Democratic party, Colonel McHenry's party, and my friend Colonel McHenry was bolting the nomination, and I think the soldiers should have sustained the nominee of the Union Democracy. My friend, Colonel McHenry, has a record which will forever fix his "loyalty." If my humble testimony to his "loyalty" were worth anything, but I am afraid it is not, I would cheerfully give it. He is as patriotic a man as lives. To prove whose blood is redder for the Union, he has made incision on the battle-field. The line from which he draws that blood attests his patriotism. The principles upon which he stands to-day attest it.

But I was about to observe, Mr. Speaker, that I object to these military orders because of their natural influence on the minds of the soldiers. If I had testimony sufficient to convince me that there were enough of soldiers voting on that presupposition to give the majority to my colleague, I confess that I should hesitate before I would declare him entitled to his seat. I do not know how a private in the ranks could vote freely under the influence of such orders, and of the active interference of his superior officer against a candidate. But I do not believe that that operated to any such extent as to vitiate the election. On the contrary, I am of opinion that although many of the soldiers would have preferred to vote for my friend Colonel McHenry, from knowing him a fellow-soldier in the field, and some, perhaps, from having served under him, yet I am of opinion that the soldiers of Kentucky in general would wish to sustain the nominee of the Union Democracy, that noble party that, under the lead of men immortal, piloted them through the darkness and storm of '61 and '62.

Mr. Speaker, I have made these observations because, while I intend to vote for my colleague, I did not intend to do it in silence, under any circumstances that might seem to give my indorsement, or the sanction of the colleagues from Kentucky with whom it is my pride and pleasure to act on this floor, of the right of Federal officers, civil or military, to interfere in the election in Kentucky, to dictate to county judges whom they should appoint as judges of election, or to dictate to judges of election whom they should permit to be candidates, or whom they should permit to vote; denying with uplifted hands that they have any right, under any circumstances, to do anything of that sort. And, sir, as this may prove a matter of considerable importance in the coming presidential election, I have been all the more desirous to express thus publicly my disapprobation of these orders, as well as that of the colleagues with whom I cooperate.

I want no repetition of these outrages. I want a fair, peaceable, and free election in Kentucky in the approaching presidential election. Then, if she gives her vote to General Fremont, or Abraham Lincoln, or Benjamin Butler, or anybody else, no one will yield a more perfect obedience to the voice of the mother of all Kentuckians, the ever-honored Commonwealth, than I, the humblest of her children.

But I want that election to be free, because the people of that State are free, descended of free-men, and I trust unable to endure life on any terms unworthy of the sons of the free. And if that election is not free, I trust, animated by the spirit of those ancestors, they will prove that their blood still lives in their veins and burns with generous ardor.

Mr. VOORHEES resumed the floor.

Mr. SMITH. I ask the gentleman from Indiana, before he proceeds, to allow me a few minutes' time.

Mr. VOORHEES. How much time does the gentleman from Kentucky desire?

Mr. SMITH. Not more than fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that I do not expect to occupy anything like the hour to which I am entitled, and I prefer to go on now.

Mr. SMITH. If it is understood that the debate in this case is not to close when the gentleman from Indiana has concluded his remarks, I have no desire to interfere with the gentleman at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. Gooden in the chair.) The Chair understood the arrangement to be that the contestant was to occupy an hour, then with the assent of the sitting member the gentleman from Indiana was to have the floor, after which the sitting member and the contestant were to close the debate.

Mr. YEAMAN. It may have been so expressed. My intention was that all the members who desired it should address the House before I claim my right to the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that will be the understanding of the House.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will yield the floor to the gentleman when I get through. I do not expect to occupy more than half the time allotted me.

Mr. Speaker, I perhaps ought to be content to leave this case as it stands, after the able, thorough, and very eloquent speech of the contestant himself. He has covered the whole ground, so that there is hardly a place for a word to be added in his behalf. Whatever may be the action of the House, the contestant has added one more claim to the gratitude and affection of the people of Kentucky, and to the pride which they already entertain in him as one of her most brave and gifted sons. This he has done by the presentation of his case to-day, and in the presentation, in that connection, of the cause of constitutional liberty.

But, sir, having made a minority report from the Committee of Elections, I deem it proper to state very briefly the reasons which induced me to take that course. Before I do so, however, I must express my surprise at the course the Kentucky delegation have seen fit to pursue, a course which places me in the peculiar attitude of defending the freedom and purity of the elective franchise in that State without the support of her own Representatives. I was amazed at the position assumed by the gentleman from Kentucky who has just taken his seat, [Mr. Wadsworth], speaking on behalf of the Kentucky delegation, admitting fully the illegality of the arbitrary and unconstitutional interference on the part of the military authorities in this election, and yet failing to hold invalid the election which resulted from that interference and usurpation. Sir, I regret the position in which I am placed, but I feel in some degree authorized to speak for Kentucky. Though not quite "to the manner born," yet my fathers were, and their dust sleeps in her earliest graves. I shall therefore speak as one of kin by blood, if not an immediate child of the household.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. Wadsworth] says this election was not, in his judgment, controlled or affected by these military orders, which he joins me in denouncing. Sir, I find in the Constitution of the United States that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof." In accordance with this provision of the Constitution Kentucky prescribed the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in her various districts. But this election in the second district is confessedly and abundantly proven in every part of the evidence to have been held, not pursuant to the laws of Kentucky, but precisely pursuant to these military orders, which the gentleman [Mr. Wadsworth] has so eloquently denounced. The judges of election swear to these facts. They swear that they held this election in conformity to these military orders and not with reference to any law that Kentucky had made on that subject; that if the law conflicted with these orders they obeyed the orders and not the law. This is sworn evidence, sir.

Mr. Speaker, I have served nearly four years as a member of the Committee of Elections, ever since I entered this House. I have taken for my rule of action as a member of that committee and of this House that when I indorse an election it shall be both free and pure. I propose to show that this election was neither. The judges themselves swear that it was not free, and I will show you by the evidence that it was vastly impure.

What are the facts? A colonel by the name of John W. Foster, of Indiana, issued the first regulation of the elective franchise in the State of Kentucky contrary to her own laws. On the 28th of July, 1863, he issued his order. What is it? He commands that "none but loyal men shall act as officers of the election." What next? These judges of election are ordered to allow no one to offer himself as a candidate for office, or be voted for at said election, who is not in all things loyal to the State and Federal Governments, and in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war for the suppression of the rebellion. The order then winds up in this wise:

"The judges of election will allow no one to vote at said election unless he is known to them to be an undoubtedly loyal citizen, or unless he shall first take the oath required by the laws of the State of Kentucky."

"No disloyal man will offer himself as a candidate, or attempt to vote, except for treasonable purposes; and all such efforts will be summarily suppressed by the military authorities."

"All necessary protection will be supplied and guaranteed at the polls to Union men by all the military force within this command."

How did this work? How was it executed? I find by the evidence that in many instances those who offered to vote and those who refused to vote, those who took the oath and those who refused to take the oath, were alike arrested; one for taking it and the other for refusing to take it. They were arrested for voting and for refusing to vote; for swearing and for refusing to swear. Such were the workings of the orders of this emperor of Kentucky. He was colonel of the sixty-fifth Indiana. He was not the greatest man in our State, but he was great enough, it seems, to be supreme in Kentucky. He was lord and dictator there, and the laws perished at his glance. Liberty fled before him. Kentucky ceased to be a sovereign State in his presence. Land of ancient glory, has age dimmed thy eye and palsied thy arm?

Sir, this order of enslavement was written in the town of Owensboro', where the sitting member resided. The sitting member says that the assertion of that fact in the minority report which I have presented, and that he franked it to his constituents, is an interpolation. In order to show how accurate the sitting member is in his statements, I will read from his own printed answer to the notice of the contestant—his own personal statement on that subject. He says:

I did not "investigate the publication of said order and oath with a view of preventing a full and fair expression of public opinion on August 3, 1863, but, in a conversation with said Foster, told him that, owing to my position, I would give no advice or make no suggestion what the military ought to do, except to request that any action taken should be as mild as possible, and sought no interview with him for that or any other purpose; and I deny that said order was intended or used for any other purpose than to enforce the law of Kentucky, and the proclamation of Joseph F. Robinson, Governor of Kentucky, of date July 20, 1863, enforcing obedience to the act of March 11, 1862. Colonel Foster did have a right to issue said order."

Mr. YEAMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. YEAMAN. The language the gentleman has quoted is in the allegation in the notice. I quoted that language, putting it in quotation marks and denying it. The denial I made was that I had seen this order before it was published. The assertion I made while the contestant was speaking, and which I now repeat to the House, was that the interpolation into this minority report of the fact of franking was made without finding it in the record or any evidence in the case, and he cannot avoid it.

Mr. McHENRY. I think I can explain all this matter. It is stated in the minority report that it was stated by the contestant in the committee-room that the sitting member had franked that document, and it was not denied. Therefore the admission upon the part of the sitting member that he had done so was drawn from that.

I take occasion here to remark that I would not say anything to do the gentleman an injury, or say anything here which was not strictly correct, and I do not suppose the gentleman believes I would. I misapprehended the gentleman's question, or at least I did not understand it, when I was asked in relation to what I stated about his knowing anything about this order before it was published. What I intended to say was that the gentleman knew of these orders before they were issued. I meant before they were sent out to the country. If that is not so, as a matter of course I withdraw anything I said with reference to that matter.

Mr. YEAMAN. I affirm distinctly that I never saw or heard of that order until I saw it in printed form on the street. The allegation I denied was that it was not submitted to me before it was printed; and I now deny it again.

Now I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question, and I want him to answer it fully. I affirm that he never was present in that committee-room to hear one motion, one argument, one allegation, or one denial. Now I ask him where he got that fact which he put into that minority report?

Mr. VOORHEES. I will answer—

Mr. YEAMAN. One remark more.

Mr. VOORHEES. No, sir. I will answer the gentleman now. I have drawn this minority report from the evidence as it is printed, from the notice of contest upon the part of the contestant, and from the answer of the sitting member. From these sources, which comprise the whole case, and every word of which is printed in a book which I hold in my hand, I drew the minority report. It is true I was not enlightened by the argument the gentleman made before the committee, and of that he complains. I confess it was my loss, but I was absent for the best of reasons—the condition of my health. I examined everything, however, in connection with this case, and reached the conclusion I have stated in this report.

One word further on this point. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. YEAMAN] need not put on any airs in catechising me. I want him to distinctly understand that if he means to state that I interpolated anything into my report attaching a personally offensive meaning to that charge, he states what is false, and the truth is not in him. That is my answer to that.

Mr. YEAMAN. One remark.

Mr. VOORHEES. No, sir; I have yielded to him time and again.

Mr. YEAMAN. Very well; the gentleman will hear from me.

Mr. CRAVENS. I trust my colleague will yield. It is a mere question of fact, which can easily be explained.

Mr. VOORHEES. I believe I generally conduct debate in a fair way; at least such is my purpose. So far as this case is concerned, I have not had the slightest personal feeling; certainly none against the sitting member. The House will bear witness in what manner he has treated what I conceived to be a legitimate argument upon this subject.

But to return to the point from which I have been diverted. Here is his answer, which I again read. He says it is a quotation. There are quotation marks at the commencement of this paragraph, but none anywhere else. Where it ends I cannot say; but I will read it again, and the House can judge whether it is not his own statement, and not that of somebody else. He says:

I did not "investigate the publication of said order and oath with a view of preventing a full and fair expression of public opinion on August 3, 1863, but, in a conversation with said Foster, told him that, owing to my position, I would give no advice or make no suggestion what the military ought to do, except to request that any action taken should be as mild as possible, and sought no interview with him for that or any other purpose; and I deny that said order was intended or used for any other purpose than to enforce the law of Kentucky, and the proclamation of Joseph F. Robinson, Governor of Kentucky, of date July 20, 1863, enforcing obedience to the act of March 11, 1862. Colonel Foster did have a right to issue said order."

There is the answer of the sitting member. I found it in examining this case. As to his franking this order over the district, he admits it upon the floor of this House. He says he had the right to do it. So he had. The law of Congress allows two kinds of matter to be franked. One is public documents. This was not a document of that kind; it was not printed by order of Congress. The other kind is a member's own private papers; and when the sitting member franked this order, as he has admitted he did, he made it his own under the law. I leave it to the House to judge how probable it is that a gentleman aspiring to office would circulate an important document bearing upon his election of which he disapproved. Sir, I do not know which is the oldest, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WADSWORTH] or myself; we are neither, however, very far advanced in life; but it has been a long time since I was young enough to believe in simplicity of that kind.

Sir, this was the first military edict in that department. What comes next? General Shackelford was not satisfied with the laws of Kentucky; he desired to improve upon them. What was the necessity? By an act of the Legislature of that State any one who had participated in the rebellion was disqualified from participating at the polls as a citizen of Kentucky. The laws of Kentucky expatriate such a man; but this, it seems, was not enough for this general. Sir, I abhor usurpation and tyranny. I love liberty; I love it with all my soul. I hate usurpation; I abhor tyrants; but I detest and despise the instruments by which tyrants work. This man erects a standard of loyalty before which all Kentucky must bow. He says that no man shall be a candidate for any office, or shall be voted for, who is not in favor of a vigorous prosecution of this war. This order was issued on the 28th of July. On the 31st, two days after, General Burnside issued his order. This pyramid of infamy, of iniquity and crime, commenced at the apex, is inverted, stands upon the small end; commences with Foster and ends with Burnside. On the 31st General Burnside issued his order; and what a fall was there! Kentucky laid down prostrate; put her mouth in the dust while the chains of a white man's slavery clanked above the graves of Clay, Crittenden, Hardin, Bowen, McKee, and Menefee. The election took place under these three orders; and you ask me to say that it was a free and pure election! I can do nothing of the kind; no, sir, not for a moment. But these orders treat of the question of loyalty. Who is "a loyal man?" My friend from Delaware [Mr. SMITHERS] who made the majority report in this case has his notions as to what constitutes a loyal man. I have mine, and you have yours. We differ, and we have the right to differ. But the constant use of this word loyalty is a little unfortunate; it means fidelity to a prince or potentate. It may be that this is an initiative word to bring us up to that point.

But Kentucky occupies no doubtful position in regard to loyalty. She has defined who are loyal citizens, and has by law expatriated from her bosom those who have raised their arms against the Federal Government. He who has given aid to, joining with and assisting this rebellion, is, by a law of Kentucky, wiped out of existence as one of her citizens. That is easy and plain to be understood. Why not stand upon that law? Why was not this Colonel Foster satisfied with that state of things? Why should he add to the definition, that a man in order to be loyal must be in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war? There are many men in the country, and honest men too, and in my opinion wiser, who think that a vigorous prosecution of peace would do a great deal more good, and result infinitely more favorably to the cause of the Union, to the cause of liberty and humanity, than the constant and wholesale destruction of human life which we now behold. They have a right to think thus, a right that will be maintained, Mr. Speaker, at all hazards.

But the orders did not stop there. I will now show by the evidence that it was not even a question of supporting this war. On page 11 of the printed documents in this case this item of testimony occurs:

"By same. Was not the following additional oath tendered to voters and made a condition upon their voting: 'You do solemnly swear that you will support the Constitution of the United States, the present Administration, and the enforcement of its laws, the constitution of Kentucky and the enforcement of its laws;' and did not voters apply to vote and offer to take Colonel Foster's oath or the expatriation oath of Kentucky, and were refused because they would not take the above oath?"

"Answer. That is correct."

Oaths were plenty there. Foster required one. The laws of Kentucky required another. And here was still another tendered to this voter:

"By same. State if you do or not know that persons at Curdsville desired to vote for McHenry and were refused by the officers because they would not swear 'to support the policy of the present Federal Administration.'"

"Answer. I do."

"By same. State the names of some of them."

"Answer. Henry Clay, Nelson Beard, George Clark, and N. Beard went up and claimed a right to vote. But they were refused their votes because they would not take the oath to support the Administration. They were old men, and Nelson Beard was ordered away from the polls. He left with tears in his eyes."

"Woe unto a country when She sees the tears of bearded men."

I repeat that as but the mournful echo of the touching eloquence of the contestant.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this was the system adopted. All laws except the military law were stricken from existence by the pen of usurpation. The judges swear here, some of them at least, that they held this election in accordance with these military orders and with a view to no other authority. The oaths tendered were not those required by the laws of Kentucky. In many instances they were not even those prescribed by military dictation. And am I to sit here and be told that this mockery of an election must be endured?

But it has been stated here, Mr. Speaker, that the sitting member got a large majority of the votes cast at this election. I do not wonder at that. I could carry any district, anywhere between the two oceans, and by any majority, if you give me such appliances as these. The majority was large, says the gentleman from Kentucky who pleaded for the sitting member a moment ago, [Mr. WADSWORTH.] Had I the time or the inclination I could go through this proof in detail and show the system of terror which caused men not merely not to vote, but really to vote against their principles and wishes. I will turn to one case as a specimen:

"There were a good many who did not vote on account of the oath; most of them I cannot remember. John L. Davie told me he should vote for Yeaman for protection, saying he was too old to be put in prison and too poor to be robbed."

Other witnesses swore that they were threatened with the impressment of their property, horses, and stock if they voted for the contestant. The sitting member complains that I was not present to hear the argument in the committee-room. I have read this book, and that is all of the case. It is enough to satisfy my mind that this election was a farce; that it was not free; that it was not pure; that it was not legal; that there was no election in the second district of Kentucky; none. This case ought to be sent back. Let the people of that district freely, by the law of their State, express whom they will have here to represent them. I am the last man to interfere with a man's vested rights; but as my political career is coming to a close, as I expect soon to leave these halls to come back no more, to intend to finish my record by a continued and unshaken fidelity to popular liberty. Such has been my course hitherto, and such it shall remain to the end. In the dark days of despotism which I fear are soon to gather over us the people shall not point at me as one who was false when their rights were assailed in this high sanctuary of American freedom. Let those who have trimmed their sails for every wind of doctrine during the last three years, whether in my own party or the opposite, strike me now if they choose. My public work has not been done in a corner, and justice will be rendered me by those who think from honest motives.

But once more, on the subject of these military orders. They all dwell upon loyalty as a condition precedent to every right in connection with the elective franchise. And how is the question to be determined? Are you, as a judge of an election, to look into my breast and see what is there? Did John W. Foster or any other of these usurpers bestow omniscience on the judges of this election so that they could divine a loyal man when he approached the polls? Do not press such a consideration. On the contrary, the law of Kentucky prescribes the oath he shall take, and when he has taken it that is the end of it. That is the sole standard of loyalty and the guarantee of his rights. The law of Kentucky prescribes that when a man has lifted his hand in rebellion he is no longer a citizen, and it provides the mode by which that shall be ascertained. In the face of this are you going to clothe judges of election with irresponsible power to say who shall and who shall not vote, to say who is and who is not loyal? But I know that my time and breath are wasted. I know that facts and law make no impression; men have made up their minds; I have a feeling closely akin to despair, and I only speak now that free government may have a few words of defense, however feeble. Sir, everything else is gone. This is the last. The ballot alone remains. The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is destroyed, the liberty of the press stricken down, newspaper offices seized and their editors arrested because an abolitionist commits a forgery. If we surrender the right to free elections we surrender all.

What has been the action of this House on the subject of elections? I went through with the cases from Missouri. I heard the proof, and I know what military elections are; I know what they mean. And this last stronghold of liberty, the ballot-box, is now in the hands of unlawful, heartless, and audacious power. The talons of the vulture have seized the very heart of American liberty. Sir, it may be that our doom is sealed; it may be that the people will submit to all; it may be that we are to be added to the long list of nations that have finally surrendered their liberties. It may all be; I cannot read the future, but I hope my eyes may be closed in eternal sleep before that hour arrives.

Our Government is based upon the absolute consent of the people acting through their particular local communities, acting through their municipalities, acting through their State sovereignties, and acting as sovereigns in all matters in which they are not limited by the Constitution of their own making. It is their province to provide when and where and how their elections shall take place; they are to prescribe it by their action as States. Kentucky had done so, but the Federal Government steps in and strikes down that right.

Sir, personal considerations are trifles light as air in connection with so great a question as this. I regret very much that the sitting member should for a moment think that my feelings had influenced me in the slightest degree in the conclusions which I have reached. On the contrary, I had entertained none but the kindest feelings for him. His conduct since he has been a member of this House has been such as to make no unfavorable impression upon my mind. What I have done has been solely in the discharge of an official duty and in pursuance of the course I have marked out for myself in all matters of this character. I repeat this is a popular Government; I stand by my Government; its foundation rests upon a free ballot-box, and I hope it will never be surrendered. It never shall be by my act. I hope the people will barricade it with their dead bodies piled high before it ere they allow it to be torn from them. The cause of liberty is the cause of good government; it is the cause of law; it is the cause of the Union; it is a cause all men ought to live for; it is a cause all honest men are willing to die for.

You prate about the liberty of one race, I speak for the liberty of another. The black man has his champions on this floor, the white man shall have his. Let but the finger of wholesome restraint touch the hem of the garment of the black man and the air becomes redolent with your impassioned wails. He is your theme and your joy. I stand here for the forgotten, neglected white man and for his rights. I strike for my own blood and my own race.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it was far from my purpose, when I rose, to go into an elaborate argument upon this case. It would have afforded me infinite pleasure to have rested the case upon the argument of my friend, the contestant, but it is due to him that I should notice one other matter. Not content with robbing the people of the second congressional district of Kentucky of their right to a free election, the attempt is also made to rob the contestant of his well-earned character and brilliant reputation for devotion and fidelity to his Government, not to a temporary Administration, but to a permanent framework of law. He has been unfortunate. He obeyed the Constitution and laws of the United States and the constitution and laws of Kentucky on the subject of slavery instead of rendering obedience to the party in power. All other sins are venial but this. There is no grace or pardon for this enormity. Let crime take any other shape than that if it expects favor with those who rule us now. For this offense the contestant's head rolled from the block under the ax of arbitrary power without a moment's notice to shrive himself and prepare. It was true that he had led his regiment through the fiercest battles of this war with more than conspicuous gallantry. It was true that he had fallen on the field, and given the poor boon of his young blood to what he conceived to be a struggle for the Government of his ancestors. It was true that Colonel John H. McHenry, at the head of the seventeenth Kentucky, planted with his own hand the first Federal flag that waved over the enemy's works at Corinth. But all this weighed lighter than a feather in his behalf when he refused to suffer his camp to be made a house of refuge for runaway slaves.

Sir, I have the message of the Governor of his native State; I have the resolutions of the Kentucky Legislature; I have the papers of the time, replete with tributes of grateful praise to this brave, chivalric young Kentuckian. It is not enough to rob him of his seat; it is not enough to deprive him of that mark of confidence, dear to every virtuous heart, the favor of his countrymen, but he must be further pursued, and his good name taken from him. And why? Where is his fault? Why should it be insinuated all through these proceedings that he is not a loyal citizen? My friend from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] told me a moment ago, with a tremor of emotion that did his heart honor, that as he himself lay wounded on the field at Fort Donelson, and looking out for relief, the first that he saw furthest in advance, where death was busiest at its awful work, was the seventeenth Kentucky, and the contestant at its head, face to the foe, and at a full run. There was the contestant, breasting the storm of battle, and pushing back the enemy who had overrun his own State, while the sitting member and his friends were quietly and peacefully at their homes, made secure by the valor of the contestant whom they now seek to destroy.

Mr. Speaker, I have now submitted the views which governed me in the presentation of this minority report. I take my stand first upon the Constitution of the United States, which guarantees to the State of Kentucky the right by her own laws to prescribe the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress. That Kentucky has done, and there, sir, is the end of it. But J. W. Foster, Colonel Shackleford, first an incipient rebel and then intensely loyal, and then Burnside, to make it all complete, abrogated the laws of Kentucky, and put forth a code of their own for the observance of the people. I cannot and will not vote to sanction that action.

You may say that men were not influenced by these things. The evidence says otherwise. Escape it if you can, men were driven from the polls for refusing to swear, not merely to support the laws of the United States and the Constitution of the United States, but the Administration and its laws.

Mr. MALLORY. Allow me one remark. I ask my friend whether there is any proof in this case at all that any man in that district was induced to vote for the sitting member by these orders. That some were prevented, or said that they were prevented, from voting may be proved; but that any man was forced to vote for the sitting member by these orders is not in the proof. The ground relied on by the sitting member and those who support him is that he received a majority of the legal votes of the district.

Mr. VOORHEES. There are two answers to that proposition. I am not called upon to uphold an election held in Kentucky, unless it is held in accordance with the laws of that State. I do not care how the people voted, if it is not a legal election. I care not whether men were kept away, or forced to the polls if it were an election without law. It is enough for me to know that here is an illegal election, that it was held in obedience to military orders which destroyed the laws of Kentucky. I mean, sir, that in so far as they conflicted with the laws of Kentucky and of the Federal Government, to that extent the military power held sway and the civil laws perished. Then it matters not to me what might be the especial fact as to its effect upon the vote; it is an illegal election.

But, sir, there is a large amount of testimony going to show the pernicious effect of these orders, as I have already shown. One man, for instance, that I have already alluded to, said that he should vote for the sitting member for protection, saying he was "too old to be put in prison and too poor to be robbed." Other threats I have alluded to, and I now simply refer to them again in answer to my friend, [Mr. MALLORY.]

Now, sir, take all these facts together, and will any candid man say that such a state of terror, such a state of threatening and violence would have no effect upon the voting population? I appeal to the men of the border States, who have witnessed the devastation which has taken place among them, to answer me whether it would not have the most powerful effect in deterring men from voting for the contestant, and in inducing them to vote for the sitting member?

But the point I make is not upon the count of the votes. I will not stop to count for majorities; I stop to count principles and sum up the law against this election. I care not how many votes are cast one way or the other. It was held under a system which subverts all Governments, tears down all law. Sanction it you who will and who dare, but, sir, I shall be no party to it; I wash my hands of it.

I have done what I consider to be my duty—my duty to the people who make this Government. Trust the people, is my motto. Why not trust them? Why thrust power between them and the elective franchise? Give us free election and all evils can be prevented or cured; strike that down and the day of evil has but just commenced.

Mr. SMITH sought the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. Gooch in the chair.) By the order of the House the sitting member will now close the debate. The gentleman from Kentucky can address the House only by unanimous consent.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move the gentleman be allowed the time he asks.

Mr. DAWES. I did not understand that it was directed by the House that there should be no other discussion, but only that after those who desired to participate in the debate had done so, then—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The understanding was that the gentleman from Indiana should address the House, and that then the sitting member should close the debate.

Mr. DAWES. I did not so understand it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SMITH. Only twenty or thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. SMITHERS. I desire to refer this question entirely to the sitting member. I desire that his wishes shall be taken in regard to it. I presume it is not the purpose to take a vote this evening, and the case will have to go over until Monday, and my friend from Kentucky [Mr. YEAMAN] could do no more than open his case to-night, and would have to pause in the midst of his argument. If he does not consent to allow the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] to proceed, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objection comes too late.

Mr. YEAMAN. I have not only consented but have demanded that every gentleman who wishes to debate the question should have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman from Delaware if he desires to take a vote upon this question this evening?

Mr. SMITHERS. I propose to take the vote as soon as the sitting member has closed his remarks.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman does not surely propose to take the vote to-night.

Mr. SMITHERS. No, sir; certainly not.

Mr. SMITH. It is not my purpose to make a speech on this occasion, nor do I intend to make any remarks except such as are directly connected with the case under discussion. I do not expect to vote upon this case, simply from the fact that I was in Kentucky at the time the committee were examining into its merits.

Mr. HARDING. With the permission of my colleague, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. SMITH. If it is the wish of the House I will yield for that purpose. [Cries of "Oh no," and "Go on, go on."] ]

Mr. HARDING. Well, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to say a few words in regard to Kentucky, and to the orders which have been referred to, issued by military men in Kentucky. It is known to every gentleman who has read the history of this rebellion, in Kentucky and all along the border, that we who have been thus situated have, to a greater or less extent, been imposed upon not only by home rebels, but that our territory has been invaded by rebels numbering from a hundred to fifty or sixty thousand.

In the inception of this great struggle of our country, it was difficult for any man in Kentucky to understand exactly the position the State would take; and when the Legislature of 1861 met, after the action of a portion of the people through their Legislature which met before had been well understood, and great efforts had been made to call a convention and take the State by force out of the Union, that Legislature of 1861 was called upon to pass such laws as would more perfectly identify her with the Government. The Legislature was called upon to pass such laws, not only forever fixing Kentucky in the Union, but that it should provide a force in Kentucky which could repel any force from the South which should wantonly invade her territory.

This Legislature passed an act which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

An act to amend chapter fifteen of the Revised Statutes, entitled "Citizens, Expatriation, and Aliens."

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That any citizen of this State who shall enter into the service of the so-called confederate States in either a civil or military capacity, or into the service of the so-called provisional government of Kentucky in either a civil or military capacity, or, having heretofore entered such service of either the confederate States or provisional government, shall continue in such service after this act takes effect, or shall take up or continue in arms against the military forces of the United States or the State of Kentucky, or shall give voluntary aid and assistance to those in arms against said forces, shall be deemed to have expatriated himself, and shall no longer be a citizen of Kentucky, nor shall he again be a citizen, except by permission of the Legislature, by a general or special statute.

SEC. 2. That whenever a person attempts or is called on to exercise any of the constitutional or legal rights and privileges belonging only to citizens of Kentucky, he may be required to negative on oath the expatriation provided in the first section of this act, and upon his failure or refusal to do so shall not be permitted to exercise any such right or privilege.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, in 1861, I believe it was, that act was passed by our Legislature; and it was passed because it was then supposed that there were from ten to fifteen thousand men from Kentucky who had joined the rebellion. In the fall of that year the State of Kentucky was invaded by Zollicoffer, by Buckner, and by Folk, in three different directions; and the men of Kentucky came from every direction to oppose these men who had boldly joined the rebel service. These men left behind them their friends, who gave every aid and comfort to the rebels in arms. The State of Kentucky thought it necessary for its own defense that these men should no longer be recognized as citizens; they believed that if our arms should be successful a large number of these men would return to their homes and claim the rights of citizenship.

Now, as to this military call, in view of the circumstances, there was not a Union man in Kentucky who did not indorse it. There was not a Union man in the Commonwealth of Kentucky who did not believe that that was just and a matter of duty. In the elections held after it became a law none but unconditionally loyal men were elected. At least it was supposed so. I remember very well that in the election in 1862 the then commanding officer in the Commonwealth of Kentucky, General Boyle, issued an order prohibiting every disloyal man from voting. And why did he do this? Because disloyal men, men who had been disposed to fight against their State and nation, had the brazen impudence to come and offer themselves to vote, so that they might control the offices of the State. This order, however, had the effect of having Union men elected, and of repelling rebels and rebel sympathizers.

In 1863 there was another election. The whole State of Kentucky had been under rebel rule prior to that time; Bragg and Smith had occupied the entire State.

The battles of Richmond and Perryville, and other small engagements, from one end of the Commonwealth to the other, had been fought. How was the Union sentiment or the rebel sentiment in Kentucky to be discovered? When these two great rebel armies came in under Bragg and under Smith, Union men all over the State fled from it, especially those who had any prominence. The rebel sympathizers remained at home; received the rebels with open arms, and waved rebel flags from the windows of their houses. Were the eyes and ears of Union men closed to these demonstrations? Did not those who had to flee from the State feel the position in which they were placed? They did; and what was their course when they came back? Conventions were held. The nominations were made. The Governor, the Lieutenant Governor, the members of the Legislature and of Congress were all elected under orders issued in consequence of that affair. The former Governor (Magoffin) having been requested to resign on account of his disloyalty, his successor, who was elected by the Senate, (Governor Robinson,) issued, just prior to the election in 1863, a proclamation which I will read to the House:

Proclamation by the Governor.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

For the information and guidance of all officers at the approaching election, I have caused to be herewith published an act of the Legislature of Kentucky entitled "An act to amend chapter fifteen of the Revised Statutes, entitled 'Citizens, expatriation, and aliens.'"

The strict observance and enforcement of this and all other laws of this State regulating elections are earnestly enjoined and required, as being alike due to a faithful discharge of duty, to the purity of the elective franchise, and to the sovereign will of the people of Kentucky expressed through their Legislature.

Given under my hand as Governor of Kentucky, at Frankfort, this 10th day of July, 1863, and in the seventy-second year of the Commonwealth. J. F. ROBINSON.

By the Governor:
D. C. WICKIATTE, Secretary of State.

Following up that proclamation, General Burnside, on the 31st of July, issued his order. Was it true or not that at that time Kentucky was to be or had been invaded? John H. Morgan with three or four thousand men had been in the State for some time and had traversed it from one end to the other. He had crossed over to Indiana, and was on that grand raid which terminated in the capture of himself and his men. Not only was John Morgan on that expedition, but it was understood by the military authorities that he was but a forerunner of General Bragg, and that he had been sent to attract attention till Bragg could move with his force and occupy such portion of Kentucky as he thought proper. Bragg was foiled by Rosecrans. He sent out Colonel Scott with fifteen hundred or two thousand men, who were driven into the district of my colleague, [Mr. WADSWORTH], and from that into the district of my colleague, [Mr. RANDALL]. He was in a portion of the State until after the election. General Saunders, who fell at Knoxville, under orders from General Burnside, met him first at Richmond in the central portion of the State, and drove him to Paris, Mr. CLAY's district, and then with fighting more or less for ten days drove him out.

Was there then, in view of these facts, any authority for this military order? Was not the State overrun, from one extremity to the other, by rebels under Morgan, killing our men, burning our stores, wasting our property, stealing our horses, and laying waste our lands? And yet they were received with joy and gratification by the sympathizers with these devils and fiends incarnate. Was there no authority on the part of the commander-in-chief to say that these sympathizers and aiders and abettors in treason should not vote, and should take no part or parcel in the State organization and State election?

Sir, as a loyal man, I say it was right; as a loyal man, I indorse it; as a loyal man, I approve of what General Burnside did; as a loyal man I say he would have been recreant to his duty as a patriot, that he would have betrayed his duty as a general had he not done it.

Now, sir, if there had been no war, if there had been no invasion of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, if there had been peace all over the land, there would have been no orders. Who made the war? Who made such an order for Kentucky necessary? It was the traitors of Kentucky in conjunction with the traitors of the South. I tell you it was right he should issue the order, and it was right to execute it in the second district of Kentucky. What its effect may have been in the second district of Kentucky I know not, for, as I said, I have not gone into an examination of the facts of this case, and I would not have troubled this House at all if these sweeping assertions had not been made affecting the elections in the entire Commonwealth of Kentucky.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to ask my colleague whether he indorses the order issued in this second district by Colonel Foster?

Mr. SMITH. I am not speaking of the order of Colonel Foster. I will come to that by and by. I am speaking of the order of General Burnside. That order reads:

"Whereas the State of Kentucky is invaded by a rebel force with the avowed intention of overawing the judges of elections, of intimidating the loyal voters, keeping them from the polls, and forcing the election of disloyal candidates at the election on the 3d of August."

Was that "whereas" true? Had not Kentucky been invaded? Had not a force come into the State from Tennessee, where the rebel army was, and had not the declaration been made that there should be no election in Kentucky? It was so understood everywhere, it was so understood by the Governor and by every official in the State. In the short canvass I made through my district I was three days in company with the present Governor of Kentucky, who was then making his speeches. He believed it; he took the same position which I took and which I take now, that these secessionists were not entitled to vote, that they were not citizens of the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

Well, sir, what induced General Burnside to exercise that authority? Was it because he felt he was a tyrant? Was it because he wanted to come down with an iron grasp upon the people of Kentucky, grind them to dust, and wipe out their liberty? No, sir, it was to operate against a class of men who have never received any condemnation from a certain class of newspapers in this country, against whom the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] has never uttered a word; who are trying to suppress the loyal people of Kentucky and grind them in the dust. That is the reason why he exercised that authority; that is why he issued the order; these rebels were there in force and a larger force was behind them. It was these loyal men the order of General Burnside was issued to protect. It was asked for by the loyal men of Kentucky, and if you will ask the leading and all loyal men of Kentucky to-day if they indorse it they will say yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If my colleague will allow me, I would like to ask who those loyal men are? I have never heard of them. I think the people of Kentucky would like to know who they are.

Mr. SMITH. I will not undertake to give my colleague the names of the men who indorse the order of General Burnside upon that subject, but I would like to ask him, if he believes the order was wrong, if he believes it was illegal, if he believes it was unconstitutional, if he believes it was tyrannical and oppressive, why he did not call upon the Government of the United States to know by what authority General Burnside had issued it? Why did he not raise his voice when he was canvassing his district, and denounce it before the people?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did.

Mr. SMITH. My colleague may have done it, but I never heard of it before.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My colleague will recollect, if he calls to mind what I said, that I addressed my remarks principally to the orders issued by Colonel Foster and General Shackleford, and drew a distinction between those orders and the orders of General Burnside. I expressed the opinion that those orders of Shackleford and Foster were entirely illegal. I have asked my colleague to say what he thinks of these orders of Foster and Shackleford, but he has not given me any answer.

Mr. SMITH. I hope that the gentleman will not press me for an answer on that point until I get to it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to discuss that law passed by the Kentucky Legislature, and what has been alluded to by my colleague. That will be discussed before our people; they will be the arbiters, and will decide what platform they will indorse, and what President they will elect at the next November election. These orders, which date back into 1862 and 1863, have nothing to do with the presidential election. They were for the benefit and the salvation of the people of Kentucky. There are now no orders in Kentucky preventing a man from doing his duty if he does it honestly.

But, sir, I say that these men have no more right to vote in the presidential election than they have in the State election. I will say, furthermore, so far as fairness in election is concerned in Kentucky, that in every district gentlemen had opposition. I know that in my own district, while my opponent was a clever man, no man was more opposed to the Government, or had stronger sympathies, in my opinion, with the South, than he, though he did nothing absolutely against us. I know that my colleague from the Louisville district [Mr. MALLORY] had opposition. I know that he discussed the policy of the Administration, the course of the war, and everything connected with it. The people indorsed my colleague because his opponent was allied with the copperhead element in Kentucky.

Mr. MALLORY. Let me do justice to my opponent, as he has been alluded to by my colleague. I was opposed by a man who claimed that he was a better Union man than I was, and that he had a record showing that he had voted, while a member of the Legislature of Kentucky, for acts more radical than I was disposed to advocate. But the direct issue between my competitor and myself was whether any more men and money should be voted to carry on this war; he taking the ground that it should be stopped summarily by withholding men and money, while I was not ready for that yet. He claimed that he was a Union man; many believed that he was a Union man. He voted for the expatriation act which has been referred to.

Mr. SMITH. Does my colleague believe he was a better Union man than his opponent?

Mr. MALLORY. I believed that I was a better Union man than he was.

Mr. SMITH. I know that the gentleman's opponent in the beginning of the war was a strong Union man. I served with him in the Legislature, and he and I voted on these propositions together. We voted together for that law which was read by the Clerk. I know that he voted for men and money, and for resolutions calling on the Government to furnish men and money to put down the rebellion. But before the rebellion was put down, when the rebels overran the State of Kentucky, when they grew strong, he changed his tactics and opposed the prosecution of the war. My colleague says that he believed that he was a better Union man than his opponent. I believe it. I would have voted for my colleague in preference.

Now, sir, all of these gentlemen had opposition, as I am informed. What the character of that opposition was, except so far as I have mentioned, I do not know. In reference to Colonel McHenry I will say, and he will pardon me for doing so in his presence, that a more gallant, braver, better man I do not know in the Commonwealth of Kentucky. I heard of him long before I knew him. I heard of him at Fort Donelson and at Shiloh, and when he was raising his regiment, and I commended him for the course he pursued. I have nothing to say against his character as a gentleman, officer, and true man, but I will say in reply to his criticisms on these military orders that they were for the protection of the Government which he fought to defend. The charge that they are wrong, are criminal and tyrannical, would come with better grace from a man who had not distinguished himself so much in the same cause. Burnside every one knows to be a good man and patriot. Every one knows that what he did was for the best, and his language is not improper, and it has not affected the loyal sentiment of the people of Kentucky at all. He says:

"And whereas the military power of the Government is the only force that can defend this attempt, the State of Kentucky is hereby declared under martial law, and all military officers are commanded to aid the constituted authorities of the State in support of the laws and of the purity of suffrage, as defined in the late proclamation of his Excellency Governor Robinson."

"As it is not the intention of the commanding general to interfere with the proper expression of public opinion, all discretion in the conduct of the election will be, as usual, in the hands of the legally appointed judges at the polls; who will be held strictly responsible that no disloyal person be allowed to vote, and to this end the military power is ordered to give them its utmost support."

"The civil authority, civil courts, and business will not be suspended by this order. It is for the purpose only of protecting, if necessary, the rights of loyal citizens and the freedom of election."

If my mind does not deceive me, the Legislature of 1861 passed a law which provided that none but loyal men should be judges of elections or clerks or sheriffs. The law of Kentucky prior to that was that there should be one Democrat and one Whig or one American judge, and that there should be a Whig clerk and a Democratic sheriff. But by the law of 1861 we declare, if I am not mistaken, that there shall be none but true men appointed judges of elections or clerks or sheriffs. That is my recollection distinctly. I would ask my colleague if I am correct?

Mr. YEAMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SMITH. That was my recollection.

Next comes the order of Colonel Foster, who they say is the best man against guerrillas in the world, and I guess he will continue to be. I will read his order:

"In order that the proclamation of the Governor and the laws of the State of Kentucky may be observed and enforced, post commanders and officers of this command will see that the following regulations are strictly complied with at the approaching State election:

"None but loyal citizens will act as officers of the election."

"No one will be allowed to offer himself as a candidate for office, or be voted for at said election, who is not in all things loyal to the State and Federal Governments, and in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war for the suppression of the rebellion."

"The judges of the election will allow no one to vote at said election unless he is known to them to be an undoubtedly loyal citizen, or unless he shall first take the oath required by the laws of the State of Kentucky."

Where did he get that provision about who should be candidates for office? He had a high precedent for it. That precedent was given by the commander of the department, General Boyle, a year before. Was there any complaint made in 1862 of that order of General Boyle, except by those who were ruled out? I know at the time I did not approve of General Boyle's order, because I thought the loyal sentiment of Kentucky would defeat and overthrow all opposition; but I know that in my own county, and throughout my district, so far as I could learn, the rebel sympathizers who were candidates for office all resigned, and none but loyal men were elected, and they were elected peaceably.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Did I understand my colleague to say that General Boyle the year before issued an order that no man who was opposed to voting men and money should be a candidate for office?

Mr. SMITH. That is what I understand.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I never saw it.

Mr. SMITH. It may have been in the winter of 1862-63. I know an order was issued and sent to my town, and I know that men withdrew from the canvass because not allowed to run under that order. I know I am not mistaken about that. This order goes on to say:

"No disloyal man will offer himself as a candidate or attempt to vote, except for treasonable purposes; and all such efforts will be summarily suppressed by the military authorities."

"All necessary protection will be supplied and guaranteed at the polls to Union men by all the military force within this command."

Now, sir, the statute says that this class of men referred to in the order, men who had taken up arms against the Government, men who had given aid and comfort to the enemy, should not vote except by a special act of the Legislature. The proclamation of the Governor says that act should be enforced. The Legislature said that none but loyal men should vote. The commander of the department issued an order in compliance with the proclamation of the Governor and said it should be carried out and that none but loyal men should vote, and that those who had given aid and comfort to the enemy should not be entitled to that privilege. And Colonel Foster follows the example of the Governor, and General Burnside also said that none but loyal men should vote.

Why was that done? Gentlemen upon this floor will remember that a provisional government was set up in a portion of Kentucky including the first district and a part of other districts. The headquarters were at Bowling Green, the residence of my colleague, [Mr. GRIDER.] There they held their legislature; they held their elections and elected members of the legislature, and members to the southern congress; they had a governor and all the municipal officers necessary for a perfect State organization. They sent their members to congress, they arrested our sheriffs and took the money from their pockets, and they committed every outrage upon Union men. That whole portion of the State was under their influence for months. And yet after we have driven those men out, do you suppose there were none left behind who had given aid and comfort to the rebels?

General Shackelford issued this identical order. He was a resident of that country, and knew the people with whom he was dealing. I say that it was the duty of the commanding officer there and of every loyal man there to prevent any disloyal man, or any man who had been disloyal, from having anything to do with the operations of the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. SMITH] a question. I have not understood him distinctly to indorse the order of Colonel Foster. He seems to indorse that order in so far as it directs the judges of election not to permit any man who is not loyal to vote. I would like him to define who is the loyal man, as Foster's order does.

I have a practical object in view. I want to know whether he is in favor of preventing men from voting who are opposed to furnishing men and money for this war. I want to know whether my colleague is in favor of disfranchising such men.

Mr. SMITH. It seems to me that the question resolves itself into this plain proposition, that there are now from three to five hundred thousand rebels in arms, attempting to invade the loyal States, to seize the capital of the country and the Treasury and archives of the Government and to drag this Congress from Washington.

Now, then, sir, no man who is not in favor of repelling these invading armies and crushing out this rebellion can be truly loyal to this Government unless he is willing to vote men and money to whip the rebels. [Applause in the galleries.] Is my colleague satisfied?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, that does not satisfy me, for two reasons: first, it is not a candid, direct indorsement of Foster's order; second, if it does indorse that order I am yet more dissatisfied, because this is wrong. Whenever a majority of the people of this country shall be opposed to the war they have a right to stop it. Every citizen, therefore, who has a right to vote at all, may vote men and money or refuse to vote men and money, may vote peace, may vote war, and neither the Army nor the Federal Executive can obstruct this right without attacking the Constitution and the liberty of the people. Thus it will be seen I make a direct issue with my colleague from the Covington district, he affirming and I denying the legality of Foster's order; he affirming and I denying the right of the Federal military power to prescribe the qualifications of candidates and voters in the States.

Mr. SMITH. My colleague will allow me to ask him a question. In the first district in Kentucky, in 1861, the polls were opened, and men went up there and voted for Willis B. Machen for the confederate congress. I would ask my colleague if he thinks that those men were loyal, constitutional, legal voters in the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under the laws of Kentucky every male citizen, over twenty-one years of age, who has resided in the State two years, or in the county where he offers to vote one year, and in his precinct sixty days next before the election, is entitled to vote unless he has taken up arms voluntarily for the southern confederacy, or held a civil office under the confederacy, or under the so-called "provisional government" of Kentucky, or has voluntarily given "aid and assistance to those in arms against the forces of the United States or the State of Kentucky," or has been convicted of certain infamous crimes.

Now, sir, if any citizens of Kentucky in the first district, in 1861, or at any time, voted for Willis B. Machen to represent them in the confederate congress, (and I believe some did,) they were guilty of a wicked and unpatriotic act, and if any man where I live should try to open a poll and vote to send a rebel member of congress to the rebel body at Richmond I would kill him if I could. He should not live where I was and do that thing without my employing all the force in my reach to obstruct it, even to the end. But if my colleague wishes to know whether I would now, in the first district, hinder by force a law-abiding, peaceful citizen of our State from voting to send Mr. Lucien Anderson or Judge Trimble to the Congress of the United States, or sanction the use of force by anybody for such a purpose, because in the wreck and crash of 1861 he voted there for Machen, I tell him no. I hail the return of every man who in good faith looks once more toward the old flag, and with national aspirations turns his thoughts away from rebellion and its congresses. What are we fighting for unless to compel the people of the revolted districts to ground the arms of rebellion, and return to the duties and the privileges of free and equal citizens of the United States? I would not shed a drop of blood for any other purpose.

But on the question of law I affirm that because a man voted for Willis B. Machen for the Richmond congress in 1861 he was not thereby under the laws of Kentucky disfranchised and denied the right of voting for Anderson or Trimble in 1863 to represent the district in this Congress.

Mr. SMITH. Was not that giving aid and comfort to the enemy?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If it is aiding and comforting the enemy within the meaning of the law against treason, that would disqualify him only when convicted "by due process of law" and sentenced. My own opinion is that every man who took up arms against the State and General Governments, in the service of a rebel power, expatriated himself, and transferred from the State to a foreign power his allegiance. He thereby lost his residence in Kentucky. If that is not so, the expatriation act is unconstitutional. If it is so I see no necessity for the act. Now, if voting for Machen in 1861 was a crime under the legislative act of March 11, 1862, then that Legislature can pass ex post facto laws. Those men are not disqualified. But if they were, the United States could not interfere lawfully, unless requested by the Legislature of Kentucky, or the Governor, in case the Legislature could not be convened. Thus these usurpations of the military, justified by my colleague, are without a decent pretext.

But to return to the point. My colleague argues that it was right and proper to use military force to keep from the polls men who were opposed to prosecuting the war. If that were so in a congressional election, how much more must it be so in the presidential election!

That is my colleague's position. It reaches far and affects the rights and threatens the peace of everybody. It amounts to this: he says to a man in Maine, in New York, or in Kentucky, unless he is willing to vote men and money to prosecute the war he must not be a candidate for office, or must not vote at an election; and that the soldiers of the Government should be employed in keeping him from the polls. Now, the right of the military to say "You shall not vote against war," is the right also to say "You shall not vote against peace;" "Indeed you must just vote as we tell you." There is no freedom where there is no choice. Every man in Maine, New York, Kentucky, and elsewhere, if he has a right to vote at all, has a right to vote for peace, or has a right to vote for war, without let or hindrance from mortal man; and there is no power anywhere to prevent him. When the people get tired of the war they ought to stop it. They have the right to stop it, whether my colleague or the Executive consent or not.

I draw a distinction between General Burnside's order and the other two military orders. General Burnside only calls on the military to support the State authorities and to enforce the State laws. His interference is as little offensive as such an act could well be. But these other and inferior officers struck down the State laws, and substituted the will of the military in their place. By the laws of Kentucky a voter has a right to vote for a candidate who is opposed to the war.

The military satrap, Foster, employed the troops of the United States to obstruct the exercise of this legal right, and in doing so went far beyond the order of General Burnside. I wish to repeat that I stand uncompromisingly opposed to such a power. The indorsement of it by a friend of the Administration from Kentucky at this time is particularly significant and alarming. If the majority of the House are of the same opinion as my colleague, the coming presidential election will not be a peaceful one. I am persuaded that every patriot desires that whoever has a right to vote under the Constitution and laws of the land, may exercise that right freely and without obstruction from the military power. If the position which my colleague takes, that no man shall be allowed to vote unless he is in favor of giving men and money to carry on the war, is to be sustained by this House or persisted in by the Administration, then there are hundreds and thousands of voters, north as well as south of Mason and Dixon's line, who will be excluded from the polls by military force, or the exclusion will be attempted. Whether that will be good for the Union cause I leave the House to decide. We are in the thick of a civil war that tasks all our resources and our united strength. The result is distant and yet doubtful.

The extraordinary partisan policy of the Government has already divided the hearts of the people. To overawe or obstruct the presidential election by military violence would defeat the last hope of peace and union. Long time ago I pointed out to this House what I deemed the chief dangers which beset our path in prosecuting the war for the Union—a division of the people in the adhering States and foreign intervention; the last only possible when the first became a fact patent to Europe. I invoked concord and fraternity; but revolution never thinks, it only feels. The Administration persevered in the work of exasperation and division. It had one prescription for every ill, force, coercion; one ambition, the consolidation and perpetuation of party power. It assailed the prejudices and attacked every right of the white race; while proclamations swept away constitutions and States, the habeas corpus, liberty of speech, of the press, of the ballot were swept away by the hand of military power. This power filled new prisons with the people, incarcerated without charges, and dismissed without trials or banished from home and family by orders from subordinates, with cool impartiality high and low, man and woman, old and young, all conditions, sexes, ages. It became a crime at last in the eyes of the Administration to belong to that historic party which from the post-revolutionary age had held sway in America, and given to the Republic Presidents, statesmen, orators, and warriors without number, and which filled the Army of the Union, from general-in-chief to drummer-boy, with its heroes.

Thus the people were divided, cut in twain, and one half driven from the support of the Administration. Yet more; for while on the one side Democrats and true Whigs withdrew from the Administration, on the other, honest and logical abolitionists, pledged for thirty years to freedom of the person, free press, free speech, free ballot, hopeless of "justice to the negro," depart from it with loud and bitter protest against destruction of habeas corpus, arbitrary arrests, suppression of free speech, profanation of the press, pollution of the ballot-box, thus isolating it upon the bad eminence of military despotism.

These capital dangers are sequents. The first is upon us; we are divided; judge how far from us is the other and final calamity.

Sir, if the people of the adhering States were united, foreign intervention could not harm us—our Government, mailed in the love of a united people, could mock at all its missiles. Nay, it might do us good, by warming and rousing the one heart of twenty million freemen to that pitch of enthusiasm which would at last show to Europe the real vigor and power of democratic institutions. But the quarrel is fundamental; the Administration, surrounded by flatterers and parasites, and emboldened by the forbearance of the people, will not yield its claims to despotic power, and the freemen of America can never surrender habeas corpus, free speech, free press, free ballot; and the Administration or the people, one or the other, must go down. Many things the people will endure and be patient, many things they will surrender to arbitrary power in a situation like the present—their products and property to taxation, their slaves to armed violence, their sons to battle—but they cannot give up their homes to unreasonable search, their persons to arbitrary arrest, their orators to banishment, their newspapers to the bayonet, and that last hope of redress, the right to vote.

And I say to the House, Mr. Speaker, that if the principle of my colleague is carried out, and military violence is brought to control the presidential election, a widespread extension to the civil war will be the result. Then foreign nations will wait no longer, but add their might to crush a people already by their own dissensions paralyzed and lost. There is but one way to maintain the Union, and that is to respect the rights and privileges of the people; to pay a wise regard even to their prejudices; to respect those ancient rights which they have possessed for over seventy years, and can never be base enough to surrender. Respect those privileges, call upon the people of the country in a constitutional manner to support the flag of the country, and they will do it with the generous enthusiasm of 1861 and 1862, before the days of the draft. The people will cheerfully undergo any sacrifices to preserve "liberty and Union;" but personal liberty, free press, free speech, free suffrage, they will never surrender. All these rights my colleague [Mr. SMITH] proposes to conquer at the polls. And to that conclusion must he come at last. Men who take the position of my colleague—that the majority shall not rule for peace or for war; that that majority shall be obstructed by the bayonet from deciding the great issues of peace or war—take a position the legitimate consequence of which is the destruction of this Union with all the glorious hopes that cluster around it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there has never been a decent pretext for armed interference with the ballot in Kentucky since there has never been any doubt about a Union majority in Kentucky. Her people are Union to-day; in spite of this Administration and all its tyranny, they love the Union to-day. They desire to live in the Union only, and a great majority of them are ready to die for it if need be to-day. As they have no memories in the past so they have no hopes for the future that are not connected with it. Sir, it is Kentucky's Union. In the happy past, Kentucky, reposing in the very bosom of the Union, was a sister cherished and loved by North and South alike; and thus her love for it rose to idolatry. Each wound now inflicted upon it, by whatever cruel hand, draws blood from her heart. South Carolina and Massachusetts, dwelling far apart by the shores of the sea, struggling for the gains of art and commerce, may hate and part and endure existence; but Kentucky, bordered by great Commonwealths whose infancy she sheltered with her arms and protected with heroic blood, whose growth and aggrandizement have been assisted by the talents and labors of her sons and daughters, whose love she receives and repays; Kentucky, hating no section, no State, sees in a dissolution of the Union only death; death to her interests, death to her affections, death to national greatness and internal peace. Her people need no despot's bayonets to make them vote for such a Union; and if, in view of the dangers which now environ that Union, the world beholds her patient under wrongs, enemies should not grow too bold, and friends might spare their idle taunts. And Kentucky will make a struggle in the coming presidential election for this Union. Yes, Kentucky will make a struggle for this Union with or without slavery, with or without war; but for this Union of free and equal and independent States, centering in the Federal Government, supreme within its circle, with the Constitution of the country as the radius of that circle. They will make a struggle for that Union by supporting free election at the polls, by supporting free press, by supporting liberty of person and safety from imprisonment except by due process of law. Ay, Mr. Speaker, they will make a struggle for freedom of the ballot, and, if need be, resist by force all efforts by violence to destroy that liberty; and if the people are compelled to fight their way to the polls, it will be the fault of those who seek to enslave them, and upon their heads be the consequences. Such a contest over the ballot-box will be deplorable and doubtful. One thing only is certain: the party that fights its way to the polls successfully never finds room there for its adversaries.

Now, sir, I am not against men and money. I have been for war since my State was invaded by the rebel army. I was not swift to shed brothers' blood, and sought the honor and safety of the Union by peace, but accepted war at the hands of audacious invasion as a necessity when I could no longer play any honorable part except in war. I am for war now, war against armed rebellion to restore obstructed Federal rights, not for a war of subjugation or extermination, a war against States or upon the property of peaceable citizens, not for war upon habeas corpus, public speakers, and newspapers, not for war upon the ballot-box. I do not, therefore, fall within the category my colleague proscribes, the "no more men and no more money" men. I am for more men and more money until the rebellion shall be put down. But, sir, I say that if the freemen in the North and in the South believe at any time that it is better to have peace than war, they have the right to express that opinion at the ballot-box. According to the opinion of my colleague they have no such right, and force should hinder them. According to my colleague the military have the right to determine who shall vote and who shall not vote, to determine who shall be candidates and who shall not be candidates.

Now, sir, suppose the Chicago convention should do what I suppose it will not do—nominate some man who is for peace, who says this war has lasted long enough, who says we have sacrificed enough blood and enough treasure, and that he is in favor of settling this question by amicable arrangement, that he is for referring it to the arbitration of some foreign Government; (I am not for such a man;) but suppose he should be nominated, and present the question whether the war has not lasted long enough, and whether the future safety and prosperity of the country does not depend upon the restoration of peace. Will my colleague say that men all over the country, from Maine to Louisiana, must be obstructed by military force from voting for a man so nominated? I cannot believe my colleague will answer that question in the affirmative; and yet when he indorses the orders of Foster and Shackleford he cannot consistently give an answer in the negative.

There is no difference between him and myself as to the other class: Those who have taken up arms against this Government, those who have taken office under the rebel government at Richmond and the "provisional government" for the State of Kentucky, and all those who have assisted their "armed forces," are not citizens of Kentucky and not voters. How are you to find that out? Are you to send Federal sous-lieutenants all over the State, and station them at the polls to say what men aided the rebellion, who was "loyal?" You would have varying decisions. Each officer would have a different standard of "loyalty"—a different understanding of what is meant by giving "aid and comfort." Some would say refusing to vote men and money was giving aid and comfort to the rebellion, and would exclude that class of men from the polls. Some refusing to vote for the candidate of the "Loyal League;" some refusing to go for our "gallant colored soldiers;" some for denouncing the war on speech, press, suffrage, liberty. There would be a dozen different decisions. It would be subjecting every one to the arbitrary will of the bayonet. No Federal officer, civil or military, dare interfere in a State election without taking upon himself a responsibility that will some day overwhelm him with ruin; like a rock falling on him, it will grind him to powder. No, sir, men disqualified, men disfranchised are those men whom the impartial judges of the election primarily determine to be disfranchised when offering to vote, with an appeal to the courts for redress of any injury which the judges may have done by refusing the ballot to the voter.

I want it known that I vote to retain my friend from the second congressional district in his seat because the majority of the people elected him, and wanted to elect him, and had the opportunity to do so. That is proved, and I believe he is the fair choice of the district. On that principle alone I am for his right to the seat.

Sir, if the correctness of the positions I have assumed is generally recognized, there need be no trouble outside of the conflict of arms between armed forces in the further progress of the civil war, and will be none, unless the servants of the people, listening to such doctrines as my colleague indorses, use the power temporarily committed to their hands to attempt the establishment of a military despotism.

Mr. SMITH. My colleague cannot divert the mind of the country from the fact at issue. There has been no military interference in the loyal States; it is only where men have actually engaged in treason that military interference has occurred; only in that section of country where armed rebels have stood and stand to-day. In the Commonwealth of Kentucky, however much I regret it, in my own district and in the district of almost every member from that State, there is not a day which passes by that does not tell us of the death of some Union man.

Who is to judge as to who is a loyal man and who is not? These men who are called sub-lieutenants, who have gone into the field and risked their lives for the country, shall be the judges so far as I am concerned.

No, sir, my colleague cannot fix it on me. It has not been in any political canvass I have made since the war began; in no speech at home or abroad have I ever recognized the right of the country to disfranchise a man who is entitled to vote. If a man in Kentucky, Ohio, Pennsylvania, or Massachusetts, becomes disfranchised, it is because of his own act, and he must not put the blame at the door of any one else. If he chooses to trample under foot the Constitution and the laws and is shot, or sent to prison, or kept from the polls, he has no one but himself to blame. The Government pursues its course in defiance of him.

But my colleague has gone a step further than I have. He declares that he would shoot down like a dog the man who should come to the polls who had voted for Macheen. Who is the worse man of the two, I, who would but keep him from the polls, or he who would shoot him down?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would be a friend of his if he would be a friend of his country, but no man should give such a vote as that where I was if I could prevent it.

Mr. SMITH. I propose to do this thing legally; I propose to do it under the acts of Congress, and under the acts of the Commonwealth of Kentucky. Within those laws I intend to keep, and by those laws I would keep disloyal and treacherous men from the polls. But I would not redden my hands in their blood.

Whatever effect this doctrine may be intended to have through the country I know not. My impression is that the presidential election will be a peaceful one; but no man is afraid of military interference who is not afraid of what beats in his breast. I do not doubt that my colleague is a true patriot, for I have seen him at home, and I cannot impugn his loyalty. I cannot, and I would not. He knows the opinion I have of him. He is right in heart, and can go to the polls, and no one will interrupt him. I could go to the polls, and the veriest traitor of Kentucky would not dare to challenge me. Why? Because he knows I have always been true to my Government from the beginning to the end. It is alone those who deserve to be kept away that will be kept away, and in this coming contest for the next Presidency none but skulking traitors and cowards will fear the consequences at the polls. They are the men that ought to be afraid. They, above all others, are the men who have not courage enough to shoulder the musket, go to the field, and face the enemy. They lurk around home, sowing the seed of poison in the young and tender minds, and send the young men into the field to do battle for them. The man who stands by my side and hands me a knife to commit murder is as guilty as I who strike the blow. I have done.

Mr. YEAMAN obtained the floor, but yielded it with the understanding that he should be entitled to it when the House should resume the consideration of the subject.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting therewith, in compliance with a resolution of the House, a copy of Brigadier General G. W. Morgan's report of the evacuation of Cumberland Gap by the forces under his command in April, 1862; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 63) to settle the account of James Keenan, late consul to Hong Kong, China; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WHALEY. I ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. Brown, for ten days, on account of sickness.

Leave was granted; and then, on motion of Mr. MALLORY, (at ten minutes past five o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 28, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. WADE. I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with. I do not see any use in reading it, as no attention is paid to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be dispensed with by the unanimous consent of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection. Petitions and memorials are in order.

Mr. WADE. As there seem to be no petitions or memorials, I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 57.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no petitions, reports from committees are next in order.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 346) for the relief of Dr. Charles M. Wetherill, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. The President of the United States some time since communicated a message to the Senate accompanied by a report from Hon. Joseph A. Wright, in relation to the International Agricultural Exhibition at Hamburg, in 1862, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. There is nothing in it to be acted upon by Congress except a claim made on behalf of Governor Wright, our late fellow Senator. It is suggested by the President that he should be paid for his services. I therefore move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it a report, or in the nature of a petition?

Mr. SHERMAN. Rather in the nature of a petition. The message is now lying on the table. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think it should go to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is in the nature of a claim. I do not care which committee it goes to; the Senator can say whichever he chooses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 232) in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection, reported it with amendments.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to present the following report from the committee of conference on the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 40) entitled "An act making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and for other purposes," having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendments:

Strike out the words "twenty-five" and insert the word "thirteen."

Strike out the word "pupils" and insert the word "clerks."

That the House agree to the twenty-eighth amendment of the Senate.

That the Senate recede from all the twenty-ninth amendment after the enacting clause, and that the following be inserted in lieu thereof:

"That the President be, and is hereby, authorized, whenever he shall think the public good will be promoted thereby, to appoint consular clerks, not exceeding thirteen in number at any one time, who shall be citizens of the United States and over eighteen years of age at the time of their appointment, and shall be entitled to compensation for their services respectively at a rate not exceeding $1,000 per annum, to be determined by the President; and to assign such clerks, from time to time, to such consulates and with such duties as he shall direct; and before the appointment of any such clerk shall be made it shall be satisfactorily shown to the Secretary of State, after due examination and report by an examining board, that the applicant is qualified and fit for the duties to which he shall be assigned, and such report shall be laid before the President; and no clerk so appointed shall be removed from office except for cause stated in writing, which shall be submitted to Congress at the session first following such removal."

That the Senate recede from its thirtieth amendment, after the enacting clause, and that the following section be inserted in lieu thereof:

"That an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, appointed at any place where the United States are now represented by a minister resident, shall receive the compensation fixed by law and appropriated for a minister resident, and no more."

That the House recede from its amendment to the thirty-first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

JOHN SHERMAN,

CHARLES SUMNER,

E. D. MORGAN,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN A. KASSON,

J. W. PATTERSON,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are one or two amendments there referred to in that report which I do not understand. I should like to have an explanation of them.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendments concurred in by the House of Representatives are the amendments in regard to the consulates. They were disagreed to, and are now concurred in by the House. The House objected to the amendment of the Senate in regard to the appointment of twenty-five consular pupils, and in this report it is modified so as to provide, for the present, for thirteen consular clerks to be examined in the mode provided for by the law of 1856. The provisions of that law with reference to those pupils are retained, except that they are now called consular clerks instead of pupils. I think that is the only change in that respect.

In regard to the minister at Brussels, the committee struck out the amendment of the Senate and inserted simply a provision that whenever the President shall appoint a minister plenipotentiary at a court where we now have a minister resident, the effect of such an appointment shall not be to increase the salary. Under the law as it stands, the law of 1856, he may appoint a minister plenipotentiary at any of the courts of the world; there is no limit upon his power; but the effect of such an appointment would be to increase his salary. The only effect of the amendment as proposed by the committee of conference is, that in case the President does exercise this power, it shall not have the effect of raising the salary beyond the present pay of a minister resident.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is not exactly according to my recollection, as it stands with reference to the power of the President.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the report lie on the table until I can look into it. I have had the impression that the salaries of the officers at those different places was defined in every case by the statute.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the law of 1855, called the Perkins law, the salary was defined at different places; but in the law of 1856, which is now the law of the land, the salary is fixed by the grade. Our ministers plenipotentiary to England and France receive $17,500; in other places $10,000; and then the pay of a minister resident is fixed at three fourths of the pay of a minister plenipotentiary; but the pay is not fixed to the court or place where he is assigned. We examined the law very carefully, and I think if the Senator will look at it he will find it is very clear.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have an opportunity to look at it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move the postponement of the report?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let it lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to its postponement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie on the table, if there be no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Ohio. An error occurred in the engrossment of the bill after it passed the Senate, to which my attention has since been called, by which two amendments for consulates in Canada were omitted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am told it is corrected in that respect. The conferees on the part of the House examined it, and said it was correct.

Mr. MORRILL. As the report is to lie over I will look into it.

Mr. SHERMAN subsequently said: I will ask to have the vote taken on adopting the report of the committee of conference on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. I understand the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] has no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that subject will be considered as before the Senate, and the question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to suspend all prior orders with a view of taking up Senate joint resolution No. 8.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first finish receiving reports from committees. Reports are still in order.

Mr. WADE, (after a pause.) If there are no other reports I move to take up the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution indicated by him.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does not my motion come up first?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it does not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Was it not in order to make the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was no more in order than the first motion of the Senator from Ohio, which was made prior to the motion of the Senator from Indiana and postponed for the same reason, that reports from committees were first in order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Are not joint resolutions next in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not by the rule. The whole matter is under the control of the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to offer a joint resolution for reference merely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

FRENCH OCCUPATION OF MEXICO.

Mr. McDUGALL. With the consent of the Senator from Ohio, I submit the following resolution, upon which I do not ask present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution relative to the substitution of monarchical for republican government in Mexico, under European auspices; the same being House resolution No. 58.

Mr. SUMNER. Let that resolution lie over.

Mr. McDUGALL. Certainly; I do not ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie over under the rule.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 60) tendering the thanks of Congress, and for the presentation of a medal, to Lieutenant Colonel Joseph Bailly, of the fourth regiment Wisconsin volunteers; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire the joint resolution to lie on the table for the present. I shall make a motion to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia on Monday morning, but previous to doing so I desire to make a statement in regard to it.

The joint resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

VOTING IN WASHINGTON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 57) to amend the charter of the city of Washington; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. WILLEY to the amendment proposed by Mr. SUMNER, to add the following proviso:

Provided, however, That no such resident who is entitled to vote elsewhere shall be entitled or allowed to vote under or by virtue of this resolution.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected; there being, on a division—ayes nine, noes not counted.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, as amended, which will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Provided, That there shall be no exclusion of any person from the register on account of color who have borne arms in the military service of the United States and have been honorably discharged therefrom.

Mr. GRIMES. That ought to be modified by inserting the word "persons" instead of "person," making it plural.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. CARLILE. I move to insert after the word "he," in the sixteenth line, the words "is a citizen of Washington and;" so that the clause will read:

If, in his answers on oath, he shall state positively that he is a citizen of Washington and has resided in the city one year next preceding the day of said election, &c.

I can state the object of the amendment in a moment. It is known to the Senate, I presume, that there are a great many persons residing in this city in a clerical capacity and in other capacities in the employment of the Government who are residents in other States, who have not relinquished their citizenship, and go home to the States to vote at elections. I think the control of the municipal affairs in this city should be confided to persons who are actual citizens and look upon this city as their permanent home, and who do not claim citizenship elsewhere.

Mr. MORRILL. I really do not understand the proposition of the Senator from Virginia. I cannot for my life see how a man can be a citizen of the District of Columbia otherwise than he is a citizen of the United States. A man may be a permanent resident of the District of Columbia; but is there any rule for making citizens of the District of Columbia distinct from citizens of the United States? I cannot conceive of the distinction which the honorable Senator seeks to raise in the case. He speaks of "citizens in Washington." What constitutes a citizen of Washington? If the distinction he desires to raise is this, a distinction between temporary and permanent residents, I can understand that; but I cannot understand that, in any legal sense, a man can be a citizen of Washington. He may be a citizen of the United States, or of one of the several States; but is there such a thing as citizenship peculiar to the city of Washington? That is my question. I think there is not. If a man is a citizen of the United States he is necessarily a citizen of Washington; and therefore the motion of the Senator from Virginia amounts to nothing, and carries nothing with it. It does not reach the distinction he desires to attain.

Mr. CARLILE. The object that I wish to accomplish by the amendment is to exclude from the right of suffrage in this city temporary residents, employes in the service of the Government, who have never relinquished their citizenship in their States, and who claim the right to return to their States and exercise the right of suffrage at the various State elections.

Mr. MORRILL. That is provided for.

Mr. CARLILE. I think not. It has been suggested to me by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] that the object which I desire to accomplish can be accomplished by inserting the words "is otherwise a qualified elector," instead of the words that I originally proposed.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator from Virginia will see that those words are already in the resolution, in a subsequent portion of it, and none but qualified voters can vote under this resolution, except those that will be included in addition to the electors as now qualified by law by the scope and provision of this joint resolution.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I think the Senator from West Virginia is in error in his statement. I had intended to propose a short amendment to come in at the commencement of the resolution, which

I think would effect the object that the Senator from Ohio had in view. I submitted it to him, and understood him to say that it would do so. Although it may not perhaps be in order just now, I will state what it is; and then state the reason for it in one word. I propose, after the word "person" in the third line, to insert the words "who is a qualified voter in other respects."

The Senator from West Virginia says that is not necessary, because in the latter clause of the resolution that is provided for. I respectfully submit that it is not provided for; that the term "qualified elector" in the latter portion of this resolution applies only to a certain class of persons who present certificates for registry different from that which is provided for in the first portion of the resolution; and that unless the amendment that I propose, or one similar to it is made, any person offering to have his name registered, must be registered by this commissioner, if the party offering his name for registry shall swear that he is qualified to vote. It makes the voter the judge of his own qualification, and requires the commissioner to register his name if he makes that oath. We have it here provided for that men who speak a foreign language, and who are not able to speak our own, may have the oath interpreted to them, and then make their oath. Unless the amendment that I propose is incorporated, and it is similar to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, you make the voter himself the judge of his right to vote. I therefore propose to amend the resolution in this respect if the Senator from Virginia will allow me.

Mr. CARLILE. Certainly. Read your amendment, and I may withdraw mine.

Mr. TEN EYCK. It is to insert after the word "person" in the third line the words "who is a qualified voter in other respects;" so that it will read:

That in case any person who is a qualified voter in other respects shall offer and claim the right to vote at any election held in the city of Washington, &c.

Mr. CARLILE. I withdraw my amendment.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the amendment of the Senator from Virginia to be withdrawn, and the question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Ohio who has charge of the joint resolution [Mr. WADE] has been necessarily called away, and he requested me to take charge of it. I believe I am tolerably familiar with it, and I think there is no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. DAVIS. I think there is a general agreement between the members who have expressed an opinion on this point; they all concede that no person who votes and claims a right to vote in another locality ought to vote at an election in this city. It would certainly be preposterous to allow a temporary resident here, who claimed his citizenship and his right to vote out of the District, to vote in the city elections. A citizen of this District has furnished me with a provision which he thinks will furnish a more certain and effective remedy against fraudulent voting in this city than has yet been proposed.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us take a vote on this amendment first.

Mr. DAVIS. I will read it as part of my remarks, and for the consideration of the Senate:

And be it further resolved, That all persons who may vote at any election to be held in Washington, shall lose their citizenship and right to vote in all other places until they become resident of and entitled to vote in some other place by the laws thereof; and whenever any question may arise whether any person has voted at an election held in Washington, the examination on oath of the person alleged so to have voted, or the original poll-book with the affidavit of the proper custodian thereof, or the testimony of witnesses shall be received.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know of the Senator how he proposes to regulate the laws of the States in regard to the elective franchise.

Mr. DAVIS. I will explain it. The provision is, that when a man has once voted here, he shall forfeit his right to vote in other places.

Mr. FOSTER. Why not let those places determine that?

Mr. DAVIS. I confess the proposition is liable to the objection that it undertakes to regulate State laws. The next time I propose an amendment it will be one drawn by myself.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move to add a proviso drawn by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] which he proposed to offer to Senate bill No. 114. So good a proviso, in default of something better, cannot be out of place. It would be clearly better to have the general provision which I first moved, that there should be no discrimination of color; but that failing, I fall back next on the proposition of the Senator from Maine, and move to add it as a proviso at the end of the proviso that has already been adopted. I will read it.

And provided further, That all persons, without distinction of color, who shall, within the year next preceding the election, have paid a tax on any estate, or been assessed with a part of the revenue of said District, or been exempt from taxation having taxable estate, and who can read and write with facility, shall enjoy the privilege of an elector. But no person now entitled to vote in the said District, continuing to reside therein, shall be disfranchised hereby.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable member permit me to ask whether what he is reading is a copy of the amendment contemplated by the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SUMNER. Yes; with one or two verbal emendations.

Mr. JOHNSON. And one of the "verbal emendations," I believe, is "without distinction of color." [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. It is.

Mr. GRIMES. When this joint resolution was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia by the Senator from Ohio it was not his intention, nor the intention of any member of this body, to affect the qualifications of electors in the District, either to enlarge or to diminish them. The sole purpose of the resolution was to change the law of the District which related to the enrollment of voters, the law now being that everybody's name shall be enrolled in the month of December preceding the election in June, as now construed. There have been various interpretations put upon the law, Mr. Carlisle, the former corporation attorney, deciding the law to be one way, and Mr. Bradley, the present corporation attorney, deciding it to be another. The Committee on the District of Columbia concluded that the question should be put at rest once and forever by the introduction of this joint resolution.

The Senator from Massachusetts chooses to attempt to complicate this question by bringing in every day the question of the qualification of voters. We do not wish to be incumbered with that question. We have got a bill behind this which we intend to urge the passage of, that will relate to the qualifications of voters in the District, and I give my pledge to the Senator from Massachusetts that when his Freedmen's Bureau bill comes up I will propose upon that that all the men who shall be put under the charge of the Freedmen's Bureau shall have the elective franchise, and I suppose that will cover all the persons who ought to be included in this District as well as those beyond, so that he shall have the colored qualification to his heart's content, if he will only allow us to pass this joint resolution which was not intended to relate to the qualifications of voters at all.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says it does not relate to the qualification of voters. I have the joint resolution before me, and by its express terms it perpetuates the existing qualifications of electors. I need not say that among the existing qualifications of electors is color. A person with one kind of skin may vote, but a person with another kind of skin cannot vote. But the Senator says that another bill is pending before this body which proposes to deal with this whole question. Has the Senator any assurance that that bill will become a law? Has he any assurance even that that bill will be again considered during the present session? I have none. For myself I believe it a duty not only when that bill comes up, but when any other bill comes up to which the question may be germane, not to fail to uphold the rights which have been long denied to an oppressed people.

The Senator says this resolution is simply to regulate the register. Sir, that is hardly a candid way of stating the object of the joint resolution. Its object is to extend the electoral franchise to certain persons in the District, including by express terms even those who cannot read the English language. I am unwilling that the Senate shall legislate on that matter, especially that they shall undertake to extend the electoral franchise to any persons in this District, unless they embrace in that extension a class whose rights have been postponed much longer than those whom the Senator now comes forward to protect.

I am in favor of the Senator's joint resolution; most sincerely do I wish it to pass; but I believe on this occasion, as on all others, it is better for us to consult the great, permanent, standing interest of the Republic, rather than any local interest. Permit me to say that the Senator, in urging this measure at this moment, to the exclusion of the colored race, does put forward a local interest, and at the same time forgets the larger interest which concerns the whole country.

I alluded yesterday to a document which I now have in my hand; it is the report of a court-martial held in Tennessee. A white man, it seems by the proceedings of this court-martial, was tried for murder; and the facts are set forth judicially. I will remark that there was simply an allegation that a colored woman had stolen money, and the white man treated her as follows, according to the statement of the court:

"The prisoner then procured a rope, and, addressing himself to the bystanders, asked if there was any one present who could tie a 'hang-knot,' when a man named Womack stepped forward and tied it. The prisoner then adjusted it around the neck of the woman, and throwing it over the limb of a tree, in the sight of his own dwelling, where were his wife and daughters, the work of murder began. Finding that the woman protected herself by seizing the rope with her hands, it was slackened and her hands tied, and again she was drawn up, so that her toes barely touched the ground, and in this position she was held by the prisoner until from suffocation and exhaustion her head fell on one side. Through the interposition of the prisoner's wife and the bystanders, the rope was then loosened, and an opportunity given the woman to revive. While this torture was going on the prisoner declared his object to be to compel the woman to confess the theft charged upon her, but she stoutly denied any knowledge of the money alleged to have been lost.

"She was now taken by the prisoner to his yard, distant two hundred or two hundred and fifty yards, and was there stripped by him of all her clothes except her chemise. In the language of one of the witnesses, she was then confined by crossing her hands and tying them together, then putting them over her knees with a stick thrust under, holding them in that position. Thus pinioned and lying alternately on her face and on her side, as the purposes of her tormentor required, for some two hours and a half, with brief intervals, she was whipped by the prisoner with a leather thong, two inches wide and three feet long, having a knot on the end. At the expiration of this time some neighbors present said they thought he had whipped her about enough for that time, and he thereupon desisted. She was then untied and assisted by one of the neighbors toward the kitchen, staggering and falling several times from exhaustion on the way. She succeeded, however, in reaching the kitchen, on the threshold of which she fell, in the presence of the prisoner's wife, and a few minutes thereafter expired. The shameless character of the defense was in keeping with the crime. It was insisted in the defense that the woman's death was produced by some cold water, of which, in her heated and exhausted condition, she had drank; and in attempted palliation of the prisoner's murderous brutality, it was proved by several of his neighbors that he bore a good moral character, and clothed and fed his slaves well; and for himself he stated that he had once before, on a similar charge, given the woman even a worse whipping than that of which she died."

We all feel, sir, the brutality of this act. It was done by a white man on the person of a colored woman. Would he have been the author of such a brutality toward a white woman? No; it was because she was black that he thus insulted human nature and performed an act which can never be read without a blush that he is a member of the human family. And now, sir, how are we to discountenance such acts? Is it by keeping up this odious discrimination of color, by giving it the sanction of law, by giving it the authority of this Chamber? Clearly not. I appeal to you, Senators, as men of humanity, do not continue to sanction a discrimination which when it proceeds from this Chamber must exercise a far-reaching influence. It is not simply the question of a few voters more or less in this District, but it is a question of human rights everywhere throughout this country, involving the national character and its good name forevermore.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I should like to hear the honorable Senator from Massachusetts explain how, in what way the brutality of a white man exercised upon a negress will show that other negroes are properly qualified to vote in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator wish an answer?

Mr. COWAN. If there is any, the most remote, connection between the two, I should like to hear it stated.

Mr. SUMNER. I have already stated the connection, and it must be very obvious. The acts in both places, in Tennessee the outrage there, the exclusion here, both have their origin in that same discrimination of color.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise to ask the honorable member what was the decision of the court-martial. If I understood him, the man was tried before a court-martial.

Mr. SUMNER. I am very much obliged to the Senator for asking me the question. The decision of the court-martial was that the prisoner was guilty, and he was sentenced to be confined in the State penitentiary for the period of five years. But the President, in directing that sentence to be carried out, went forward in very proper terms to condemn the lenity of the court, as follows:

"The President directs that the sentence—inadequate as it is—shall, except as to the place of confinement, be carried into execution, and Albany, New York, is designated as the penitentiary where he shall be confined; but while doing so, he feels it incumbent upon him to call the attention of the Army, and especially of those charged with the administration of military justice, to the insensibility displayed by this commission, and to express the disapprobation with which it is regarded. The members of the commission, in this lightly dealing with one of the most revolting murders on record, have done no honor to themselves, and afford an example which it is hoped will never again be witnessed in the service."

Sir, the court itself acted under the influence of that same fatal discrimination of color. Had this outrage been perpetrated upon a white person, the court-martial never would have awarded so light a sentence; but, sir, it was because she was black, and therefore her pretended owner was allowed cruelly to murder her and to insult human nature.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has the honorable member any knowledge of who the members of the court were?

Mr. SUMNER. Their names appear as follows: I have before me the order from the War Department, Adjutant General's office, Washington, May 9, 1864, published in the Army and Navy Official Gazette, and signed, "By order of the Secretary of War, E. D. Townsend, Assistant Adjutant General."

"Before a military commission, consisting of Captain C. Thompson, nineteenth Michigan volunteers; Captain Owen Griffith, twenty-second Wisconsin volunteers; Captain James Nutt, ninth Indiana volunteers; Captain D. R. May, twenty-second Wisconsin volunteers; First Lieutenant George Bauman, twenty-second Wisconsin volunteers; and which convened at Murfreesboro', Tennessee, September 14, 1863, pursuant to Special Orders, No. 8, dated Post Headquarters, Murfreesboro', September 9, 1863, was arraigned and tried Robert Taylor, a citizen."

Mr. JOHNSON. My object in asking the question is answered. I had some suspicion, and it turns out to have been a well-founded suspicion, that every member of that court was a citizen of a State in which slavery does not and never did exist, and they therefore could have had no prejudice against color. I had supposed that it was barely possible that they might have been the citizens of some southern State, and had adopted what is considered a prejudice in the public mind in those States upon that account; but the whole of that court came from the same section in which more or less the same sentiments are entertained as those entertained by the honorable member from Massachusetts. I agree with the President in thinking that if the facts stated were true the sentence pronounced was a very inadequate sentence for such a crime; but I hardly think that that mildness of sentence was the result of the fact that the person upon whom the crime was committed was a black woman instead of a white woman.

Besides that, I submit to the honorable member whether it is fair, logically fair, to attribute errors of judgment or errors of a higher character to a mere prejudice, barely from the fact that a black woman has been the subject of crime? The honorable member seems to think that the fact that a black man or a black woman has been treated unjustly and cruelly, or even put to death, is conclusive evidence to show that there must be in the public mind some prejudice against that color which legislation may remove; and he supposes that that prejudice, if it has not its origin in, is in some measure cultivated and strengthened by, the fact that persons of that description are not permitted to vote.

Sir, you cannot take up a paper of the day—I am sorry to say it—in which you will not see cases of crime just as atrocious committed by white men upon white men and upon white women. I notice in the papers to-day an account of a prosecution going on in the city of New York against a white man of some sixty years of age, who has always been a voter in the city of New York, and who perhaps agrees in opinion politically with the honorable member from Massachusetts, for the cruel and barbarous murder of his wife, a white woman. Would the honorable member infer from that that any white man has been debarred from the privilege of voting, and that the fact that he has been debarred accounts for his inhumanity to his own color, or to any color?

I submit that the honorable member is wrong, logically wrong, in the view which he takes upon this question. One thing is certain, that whether a black woman has been murdered or not in the State of Virginia or the State of Tennessee proves nothing toward showing that black men here should be entitled to vote, and that we should give them that privilege by an amendment to this resolution. As the honorable member from Iowa has said, the sole object of the resolution is to do away with a practical mischief in the operation of the law as it now stands in reference to those who are entitled to vote. There are other measures pending before the Senate, as is well known, which may perhaps assume a shape that will get rid of that difference in the right of suffrage, from which, according to the philosophy of the honorable member from Massachusetts, it is clear that black men and black women are being whipped and murdered!

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland reminded us that all the members of this court came from States where slavery did not exist, and he inquired whether such persons coming from such States could have any prejudice on account of color. Now, sir, I am not going to reply to the Senator by any personal remark, but I content myself with reminding him that on this floor one of the most earnest advocates of the discrimination of color is a Senator from a powerful State, which to his honor does not sanction slavery. That, sir, is a sufficient answer to that portion of the remarks of the Senator from Maryland.

But the Senator thinks that I am not logical because I quote an outrage in Tennessee which has its origin in the prejudice of color, and insist that here in this Chamber we shall not found our legislation on a prejudice of color. Sir, I submit the question to the judgment of the Senate: am I illogical, or is the Senator illogical? I insist, sir, that you cannot sanction injustice here, especially you cannot sanction a prejudice founded on color, without quickening that prejudice and sustaining it wherever it now unhappily exists throughout our whole country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the Senator to call up the order of the day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the order of the day be suspended until this joint resolution is disposed of. I suppose the morning hour during the residue of the session is to be taken up with this particular joint resolution, or at least the morning hour of every day until the election shall have passed, to provide for which this resolution has been introduced. I suppose that if we now postpone it until Monday morning the Senator from Massachusetts will have some additional irrelevant proposition touching the negro. This joint resolution has nothing to do with the negro, but is simply to allow men to be registered who are now qualified to vote; and yet every morning that we postpone it we have some new proposition from the Senator from Massachusetts.

I desire it to be obvious to the Senate and the country that a Senator occupying a position in the majority has impeded the ordinary course of legislation upon a measure not at all connected with the questions which he has introduced into the debate. I move that the consideration of the revenue bill be postponed for a reasonable time until we can finish this joint resolution, so that other measures, in which other Senators feel some interest, may be brought before the body during the

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 160.

morning hour. If I find, however, that this measure unreasonably delays the consideration of the revenue bill, I shall then move to take it up.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be done informally.

Mr. GRIMES. Let the regular order be laid aside by unanimous consent. No one wants to speak, I think, except the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not want to speak further.

Mr. JOHNSON and others. Let us vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order can be passed over informally, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the joint resolution.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, and Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sumner, and Wilkinson—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Canlie, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Powell, Sausbury, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Conness, Doolittle, Harding, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Sprague, Wade, and Wright—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment which has been made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to inquire whether there are any amendments to the joint resolution now which will widen and enlarge the franchise. I think it is the general understanding of the Senate that it is merely to correct and avoid technical difficulties which lie in the way of those who otherwise would be qualified voters to exercise the franchise, not to change the existing law but merely to remove obstructions which may exist in the way of those who are otherwise legally qualified. If that is the understanding I am prepared to vote for the resolution; otherwise not.

Mr. GRIMES. That is the resolution as I understand it. That was the purpose of the committee who reported it and that was the purport of the resolution as it originally stood; but the Senate, acting as in Committee of the Whole, have adopted an amendment which was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts and amended on the motion of my colleague, providing that colored persons who have borne arms in the service of the United States and been honorably discharged may vote. In so far as there may be anybody of that description, it enlarges the franchise, but not otherwise.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask for the yeas and nays on concurring in that amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask that the amendment be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to insert at the end of the joint resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That there shall be no exclusion of any persons from the register on account of color who have borne arms in the military service of the United States and have been honorably discharged therefrom.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was here during the whole of the proceedings in relation to this joint resolution at the time that amendment was suggested by the honorable member from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] and was proposed to be modified by the honorable member from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY], and my recollection is that we voted on the change proposed by the honorable member from Iowa, but upon the amendment as amended there never was a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was voted upon this morning.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was not aware of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the Senate on that amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COLLAMER. The amendment reads rather singularly: "no exclusion of any persons from the register on account of color who have borne arms." Which does it mean, white or black?

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the meaning is obvious enough.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose the Senator from Iowa did not mean to discriminate against those who have been in the naval service. This is a discrimination in favor of those who have borne arms in the military service. I understand that colored men have always been in the Navy.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no objection to the modification of the amendment as suggested by the Senator from Kansas, if he deems such a modification necessary; but I think that "military service" is a generic term that covers both the Army and the Navy.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Vermont has asked me if there are such people in the District. I do not understand that there are, and I do not think there is the slightest necessity for or propriety in this amendment. Abstractly I am in favor of it, and I would vote for it on almost any other bill, but I desire that this joint resolution shall pass the Senate in such a condition that it can be immediately taken up and passed by the House of Representatives without being referred to a committee and having there to await the arrival of a day when the committee may be permitted to report, which may be days and perhaps weeks after this time. Whenever a bill shall come up embracing the principle embodied in this amendment, where it shall be likely to have any practical effect, to be of any advantage to any person or class of persons, I shall be prepared to vote for it; for I am willing to say that the men who have periled their lives in defense of the country should have the elective franchise; but the amendment here is not germane or pertinent to the joint resolution, and for that reason I shall vote against it.

Mr. HICKS. I must ask the Senate to indulge me in allowing the joint resolution to be read, or else to excuse me from voting upon it, for I have been confined to my room by indisposition, as the Senate knows, and I cannot vote understandingly unless I hear the resolution read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the original resolution and the amendment.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to make a suggestion, if gentlemen will allow me. There is no penalty imposed by the resolution on the commissioners for refusing to register, which is usual in such cases. There is a penalty on the voter who perjures himself, but no penalty on the commissioners. Such laws are usually framed with such a penalty.

Mr. GRIMES. Then they will act under the old law.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Does that law contain a penalty?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to ask whether all this is not out of order, the call of the roll having commenced and an answer having been made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No answer has been made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I thought there was.

Mr. SUMNER. I will suggest a modification of the pending amendment, in order to carry out the idea of my friend from Iowa, and to meet the criticism of the Senator from Vermont. I propose to strike out the word "who," and insert "where such persons;" so that it will read:

Provided, That there shall be no exclusion of any persons from the registry on account of color where such persons have borne arms in the military service.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes ten, noes not counted.

Mr. WILSON. I move to strike out the words

"on account of color" from the amendment, so that it will read that "there shall be no exclusion of any persons who have borne arms in the military service."

Mr. GRIMES. Then it will mean nothing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts, suppose they are minors, what then?

Mr. SHERMAN. We have three or four regiments of Ohio troops here now, and if the amendment should be amended as now proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, they would be allowed to vote. I do not know but that would be the best thing they could do. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question recurs on concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole; and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered:

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Wilkinson, and Wilson—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Canlie, Cowan, Davis, Grimes, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Sausbury, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Collamer, Conness, Doolittle, Fessenden, Harding, Henderson, Riddle, Sprague, Wade, and Wright—11.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of James Storm, of Stockbridge, Calumet county, Wisconsin, praying that he may be authorized, as the assignee of the late Catherine Mills, to make the proofs and payments and receive the title to lot No. 194 of the Stockbridge reservation, agreeably to the sixteenth article of the treaty between the Munsee and Stockbridge Indians and the United States, of the 5th of February, 1856; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

THE ARGUELLES CASE.

Mr. JOHNSON. With the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, I will ask, supposing it will produce no debate, the consideration of a resolution of inquiry that I offered the day before yesterday.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate, if he shall not deem it incompatible with the public interest, whether he has, and when, authorized a person alleged to have committed a crime against Spain, or any of its dependencies, to be delivered up to officers of that Government, and whether such delivery was had, and if so, under what authority of law or treaty it was done.

The resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 63) to settle the account of James Keenan, late consul at Hong Kong, China; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 493) for the relief of William Brindle was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume the consideration of the order of the day.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair awaits the pleasure of the Senate as to what amendments shall be considered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There were certain amendments passed over, and we may as well take them up in their order. I will inquire whether the proviso on page 87, section seventy-eight, line twenty-two, in relation to the license to be paid by savings banks, was adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not. It was passed over.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If there is no objection to that, as I understand the Senator from Vermont does not object to it and does not propose to amend it, I should like to have it adopted.

Mr. COLLAMER. I shall object to it unless the gentleman will accept of a clause that I have drawn in addition to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Read it.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is to add this proviso: Provided, That savings banks having no fixed capital and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same, and who do no other banking business, shall not be required to take a license under this act.

I propose to add that to the committee's amendment, which is to insert this proviso:

Provided, That each savings bank shall be liable to pay $100 for license as a banker.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that I object to the principle of the Senator's amendment, but I suggest to him to put it in this form: to amend the amendment of the committee so that it will read:

Provided, That each savings bank, except such as have no fixed capital and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same, and who do no other business of banking, shall be liable to pay $100 as license.

Mr. COLLAMER. That only incorporates my amendment in the committee's amendment. I thought it would be more distinct the other way, and I think so still; but if the gentleman prefers it in that way I have no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will avoid the multiplication of provisos. I understand the Senator to accept the modification of his amendment that I have suggested.

Mr. COLLAMER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Vermont proposes to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting in line twenty-two, after the word "bank," the words "except such as have no fixed capital and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same and who do no other business of banking;" so that it will read:

Provided, That each savings bank, except such as have no fixed capital and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same, and who do no other business of banking, shall be liable to pay $100 for license as a banker.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to make any opposition to it, but I see no reason in the world why savings banks ought not to pay a license like other people. If they only received small deposits then I would say they ought to be exempt from all tax, because we do not wish to strike at that kind of deposits.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They do pay on the dividends that are made precisely like other people. This is a provision to take out a license in addition.

Mr. SHERMAN. You license lawyers, you license doctors, you license every employment of life, and why should you exempt a savings bank?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is not an employment.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is an employment. It is a mode of getting profits by receiving deposits.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You get the same tax out of them that you do out of the individual who lends money on notes of hand, that is upon the interest; but you do not compel an individual who lends money on notes of hand to pay for a license in addition.

Mr. JOHNSON. You do not make a man pay a license for loaning his own money.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know whether it be true that savings banks are established on the principle on which the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Vermont suppose them to be. This is a subject that has been brought recently before the Committee on the District of Columbia. We chartered at the commencement of this session a savings bank in this city. The charter was drawn by my friend from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] and drawn according to the principles, as I understand it, upon which savings banks are ordinarily established. Recently a petition was sent to us asking that the privilege be extended so as to allow them to receive general deposits. When it came before the committee the other day I objected to the granting of that petition for the reason that I did not think, first, that there was any precedent for it, and in the second place I did not think it was safe policy to allow them to receive general deposits, because I was afraid it might disturb the special deposits, which are used as part of the sinking fund. But I was told that these savings banks in Pennsylvania

Mr. MORRILL. And New York.

Mr. GRIMES. And, my friend says, in New York—I do not remember how that is—are allowed to receive general deposits and negotiate paper.

Mr. HARRIS. That is so.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from New York says it is so. If that be so, savings banks of that description ought to be taxed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are taxed.

Mr. COLLAMER. We do tax them, and make them pay a license in addition. Every savings bank, except such as have no fixed capital, and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same, and who do no other business of banking, is liable to pay $100 for a license, under this amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is exactly its effect.

Mr. COLLAMER. In the first place, the amendment of the committee provided that every savings bank should pay a license of $100. I propose to insert as an exception, except savings banks who have no capital and whose business is confined to the loaning of deposits and do no other banking business.

Mr. JOHNSON. Where do you insert it?

Mr. COLLAMER. In the body of the committee's amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to. The amendment of the committee, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The next section to which I will call attention is section eighty, on page 106. That seems to be very obscure as it now stands. I think the obscurity may be relieved by striking out the word "a," in line three, after the word "require," and to insert "an additional;" and after the word "license" to insert the words "as a dealer;" so that it will read:

SEC. 80. And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in the preceding sections of this act laying duties on licenses shall be construed to require an additional license as a dealer for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise made or produced and sold by the manufacturer or producer at the manufactory or place where the same is made or produced.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is another verbal amendment that I wish to make in that section. In the second line I move to strike out the words "laying duties on" and to insert "requiring;" so that it will read:

That nothing contained in the preceding sections of this act requiring licenses shall be construed, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have an amendment with regard to bullion; but I see that the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS,] who takes some interest in that question, is not at present in the Chamber, and I will pass it over and take up section one hundred and sixty-one, relating to the question of banks.

Mr. McDougall. I call the Senator's attention to the duty on the article of quicksilver, just before the provision in regard to bullion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I see that the other Senator from California is not in his seat; and I propose to defer that question until he is present.

Mr. McDougall. I wish to reserve also the duty on quicksilver as well as on gold and silver.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I propose now to take up section one hundred and nine, relating to banks and banking, on page 161.

Mr. SHERMAN. When that section was up the other day I offered an amendment to it, which I suppose is the pending question, to strike out the whole section and insert a substitute.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator

—he can act according to his own pleasure about it—I understand there is a committee of conference on the bank bill at the present time which will probably report early in the week; and perhaps it would be as well to defer action on this subject until that is determined. I think we shall then be able to act more understandingly upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. I wish to modify my amendment a little, but I can do it when the matter comes up again.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a very slight amendment in section one hundred and thirteen, line sixteen, page 168, which was suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, who is now in the chair, [Mr. ANTHONY,] which I think ought to be made. I move to add a final "s" to the word "assessor" in that line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest to the Senator that there are two or three places in the bill where "the District of Columbia" should be inserted in connection with the States and Territories. I do not know whether it is best to do it now or not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will omit them now and move them some other time, I shall be very glad to have those amendments made. I dare say there are omissions.

Mr. POMEROY. Very well.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose we may as well now take up section one hundred and seventy-eight, on page 232. It is the section striking out the duties on liquors of domestic production on hand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question then will be on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance to strike out section one hundred and seventy-eight, which will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

SEC. 178. And be it further enacted, That all spirits of domestic production and held for sale on the 1st day of May, 1864, and upon which no tax shall have been paid, shall be subject to a duty of fifty cents per gallon, and all such spirits on hand for sale upon which a prior duty shall have been paid shall be subject to a duty of thirty cents per gallon: Provided, That bona fide retail dealers in spirits duly licensed shall not be taxed on their stock on hand whose quantity on hand does not exceed two barrels.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if the question of the tax on spirits on hand was not now presented in a somewhat different form I would not say anything in addition to what I have said heretofore in regard to it. I still retain my opinion, although I found myself in a very small minority, that from the beginning when we commenced putting the exceptional tax on spirits, the first tax amounting to more than the original cost of the spirits, we should have assessed a corresponding duty on that on hand. The Senate, however, adopted a policy founded upon a principle that seemed to be just in itself. While I differed from the Senate upon that subject I have no complaint to make in regard to their decision in times past. But now it is proposed to raise the duty on spirits something like six or seven times its cost. It is proposed to levy a duty of $1 50 a gallon after the 1st of January. That is about equivalent to six times the original cost of the article. It seems to me, therefore, it now presents another question when we are levying this very large duty on the article to be manufactured whether we cannot also properly levy a duty on the article on hand.

I do not wish to discriminate against the manufacture of whisky. I do not seek to tax the article of whisky because the use of whisky sometimes is a great moral evil, doing more harm probably to mankind than any other vice. In framing tax laws we cannot regulate the morals of our people. My only purpose is to levy a duty which will yield us the largest sum of money that the article can pay. I believe that spirits will yield more than any other article of excise. It has done so in France; it does it in England, and in all other countries where the system of taxation is now carefully elaborated, each item of which is carefully stated, and each item of which can be estimated almost to the £1,000 in the course of a year.

We now propose by this bill to levy a duty of $1 50 a gallon on spirits manufactured in the future; and here I may say that it would be much wiser to levy the whole of this tax on the passage of this law than to divide it into gradations. There will be no spirits manufactured after the passage of this law prior to the 1st of October. Your first scale will therefore be inoperative. In the course of the manufacture of whisky, very little is manufactured at any time during the summer and early fall months, because it is only done in connection with the operation of feeding stock and hogs, and this cannot be profitably done in the summer or fall of the year when pasturage is so cheap. The levying of one dollar a gallon on what is manufactured after the passage of this law to the 1st of October will yield you nothing unless the manufacture of spirits is forced out of its usual channel by the bounty paid between this and the 1st of October next. The same reasoning would apply to the tax proposed to be levied between the 1st of October and the 1st of January. At that time, no doubt, in the ordinary process a good deal of whisky will be manufactured.

There is no reason why a lower tax should be levied before the 1st of January than after the 1st of January except this: that the prospective tax in the future will probably force the manufacture of whisky between the 1st of October and the 1st of January. So far as it does so, it will tend to do an injury. The Government of the United States is now in the market for nearly all the surplus agricultural products of the country. We now buy more than any other person, for the use of the Army, for food and forage, of corn, wheat, oats, and all the articles which are used in the manufacture of whisky. This forcing up of the price of agricultural products between the 1st of October and the 1st of January next will only tend to compel the Government of the United States to pay a higher price for the articles which it is necessary for us to buy between those months. The only view in which this tax can be defended is that it will continue the manufacture of whisky in those months; and I say that even in that view it is a narrow-sighted policy to levy a small tax in those months, because it will tend to raise the price of corn, wheat, barley, and the other products which necessarily enter into the consumption and manufacture of whisky.

I therefore yield at once to the reasoning which would induce us to put the highest rate of duty that we propose to impose during the coming year from this time, or from the 1st of July, if you please; because after the passage of this law, and after the increased tax shall be put upon whisky, it is probable the manufacturer will stop until the demand in the future shall have exhausted the supply on hand and compel the manufacture of spirits to be sold in the future. I think, therefore, it is important that we should fix a rate to commence upon the 1st of July, or upon the passage of this bill, and that rate should be the highest proposed by Congress to be put upon this article, not only for one year, but for two or three years. By any of these taxes the manufacture of whisky during the next year, in my judgment, will be stopped in a great measure. I have inquired from those who are engaged in the business, and they have generally informed me that the stock on hand is amply sufficient, considering the high tax that will have to be paid on that manufactured in the future, to suspend the operations of the distilleries for some months and perhaps for a year; but upon that there is a difference of opinion. My own opinion is that very little whisky will be manufactured for one year if the tax is now levied at $1 50 a gallon.

The question then occurs to us whether now, when we need so much money, when our legislation has added so much to the value of this article on hand, we can afford to forego taxation on this article for at least a year to come. I go upon the assumption that the stock on hand will be sufficient to suspend the ordinary operation of the manufacture of this article until that stock is so reduced that the price will rise to about $1 75 or $2 a gallon, and then the manufacture of whisky will be again resumed. I believe that process will not occur within less than one year from this time. Under these circumstances, it is a very serious question whether we can afford to surrender to the manufacturers or holders of whisky the enormous profits that will accrue from raising the price from its original cost, fifteen or seventeen cents a gallon before the war, up to $1 75 a gallon, which it must be before any can be manufactured under the operation of your excise law.

It is said it is hard to levy a tax on an article on hand, because people buy and sell that article in the ordinary course of business, and that by so doing you interfere with the ordinary operations of trade. If the Senate in this case put a moderate tax on the article on hand they will not interfere with any legitimate or fair profit. We propose now an increase of the tax on the article to be manufactured from sixty cents a gallon up to $1 50 a gallon. The price of the article now in the market is from $1 25 to $1 30. It has risen in anticipation of a tax of one dollar a gallon. If we now levy a tax of thirty or fifty cents a gallon on spirits on hand, we shall do no injustice whatever to any man who has dealt in the article, or who now holds in hand. They can afford to pay a tax of at least fifty cents a gallon on that in hand in addition to the twenty cents already paid; and yet they can retain that article, without competition from the manufacturers until it attains a price at which they can sell it without loss. If you levy a duty of $1 50 a gallon upon all of the article manufactured in the future, none will be manufactured until the price approaches $1 75 a gallon. That proposition is so obvious that it requires no argument; because the manufacturer, as a matter of course, will not continue the manufacture of whisky until the price reaches that point when, in the market at the time, he may sell it at a reasonable and fair profit. With a duty, therefore, on future manufacture of $1 50 no whisky will be manufactured by any sane man until whisky rises in the present market to a price approaching from $1 75 to $2 a gallon. The question now is whether, in levying such taxes as we are now called upon to levy on our people, the Government of the United States, in anticipation of the future rise, should not levy a tax on the article on hand, so that the holder of whisky at present prices will not be a loser in the market. It seems to me we have the right to do it and it is our duty to do it.

I do not concur in the idea so often mentioned here, that we have no right to tax property because property is something that is acquired and fixed, and we ought not to apply our duties to property. That is not a correct principle. All direct taxes are taxes upon accumulated property. Most of our internal and indirect taxes are taxes on future products, future manufactures, future labor; but all direct taxes are taxes on property; and yet we do not consider those taxes as unjust.

But it is said that you propose to levy a higher rate of taxation on this article of property than you do upon other articles of property. So you do, and if you did not confer upon that property a corresponding benefit the tax would be unjust, and I might say unconstitutional; it would be unjust and unequal. But here by your act of legislation you confer upon this identical property an additional value; and that makes the distinction. If you were to attempt to levy a direct tax on whisky of so much a gallon as property and a tax of so much upon land and were to make the tax on whisky higher than your tax on land, it would be unjust unless there were corresponding provisions in your bill which would tend to raise the price of whisky in the market, so as to take away the tax entirely from the value of the property. But in this case you do by your legislation add to the value of that property, and therefore you do injustice to no one.

Mr. President, I do not propose to extend this discussion any further. It is a simple proposition. The House of Representatives have adhered to this tax somewhat tenaciously. I regret very much that it was not adopted long ago. If adopted now it will add but thirty cents a gallon to the whisky which has already paid thirty cents a gallon, and it will add fifty cents to that which is in bond, and there is very much of it. It will not injure any man to the amount of a dollar, because the price now at $1 25 a gallon will at once advance, if this tax is levied, to an amount equal to the amount of your tax; so that the persons who hold the property can realize all the profits they have acquired in the market, and this section will only give to the Government the future increased value of the article.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think it is unnecessary to add much to what has been said in the debate on this question, for I presume every Senator has his mind made up. Indeed, I understood that two or three months ago every Senator had decided what were his views upon the propriety of a tax like this upon an article that has already borne the burden which the law has said it should bear, and in the hands of persons who hold it on the faith of the action of Congress. Two months ago, when the question was an original one, although the House of Representatives insisted upon it, the Senate would not consent to tax that which had already borne a tax. The principle was regarded as sufficient to carry the Senate to that point. The reason is made much stronger now, for all the dealers in the country have relied upon it that that was the position of the Senate. They have sold and bought upon that understanding. We have said to the country that we would not consent to a tax upon that which had already borne a tax. Having faith in that assurance of the Senate, men have bought up to the present hour upon the supposition that there would be no tax imposed upon that on hand. Until within a few days past, men have been buying at from $1 25 to $1 30 a gallon, as I have observed in the papers. If you impose this additional tax, you take from them that benefit which they expected to derive from the legislation of Congress according to the principle that had been recognized by the Senate.

It seems to me the objections to this legislation are much stronger, one hundred per cent. stronger now than they were when the Senate decided upon it two months ago. The argument of the Senator from Ohio is exclusively based upon the proposition that we shall, from the commencement of this tax, impose such a tax on future production as will enable the present holder to sell at an increased price which will remunerate him. The argument of the Senator is that we shall tax whisky at $1 50 a gallon, and in connection with that he says that if we do impose such a tax, we need expect no revenue from production during the coming year.

I ask Senators if they are willing to adopt a policy that will strike down this interest entirely? The Senator has well said that we cannot correct the morals of a people in a revenue bill; that it is not the purpose of Congress in considering such a bill to legislate with a view to its effect upon the morals of the community. I ask him to consider this question, while he will not attempt to tax whisky with a view to its effect upon the morals of the people; will he attempt to legislate with a view to strike down this large interest of the country?

I think that a tax of $1 50 a gallon will prostrate this interest. It is a very important one to the section of the country with which I am connected, as I attempted in a very few words the other day to explain to the Senate. Our corn is so weighty and so bulky that it cannot find an eastern market in that shape; but if reduced into the form of whisky it may conveniently and profitably find a market. The Senator will not undertake to say to the people of the Northwest that it is an immoral pursuit. The Senator yields that. He admits that it is a proper pursuit, one that may legitimately be pursued, and which the Senate should tax only with a view to revenue; but he admits in the course of his argument that a duty of $1 50 defeats revenue while it prostrates the interest. It defeats revenue because it prostrates the interest. I ask Senators then not to adopt a policy that will strike down a very important interest of the Northwest.

I said the other day that I was not going to insist any further against the tax of a dollar a gallon on the manufacture of whisky. It seemed to be the view of the Senate that that should be the rate. I think that is a very high tax. It is five hundred per cent. above what was imposed two years ago, and five or six hundred per cent. above what was the value of whisky two years ago. I ask Senators if they have imposed a like tax upon any other production of the country? Are the productions of New England so taxed? Are the productions of the middle States so taxed? The tax now to be imposed is five hundred per cent. upon what was the value of the article at the commencement of the war. I ask for this interest the same justice, the same fair dealing, that is extended to every other interest of the country, that it shall bear its fair proportion of the burdens of this war in connection with every other interest of the country; and in making that request of the Senate, I ask that which is but right and fair.

It may be said that we can cease to produce whisky, but then we cease to obtain revenues; we defeat the purpose of the bill; and at the same time very materially impair the interests of the corn-growing section of the country. I then will rely upon it that the Senate will not impose a tax for the coming year of more than a dollar a gallon.

The argument of the Senator from Ohio was certainly very conclusive that there ought not to be gradations in the tax through the year. It has a tendency to stimulate the production of whisky during these fall months, which ought not to be done in view of the interest of the Government, as he has well suggested, in the purchase of corn, which she needs in such large quantities, and also in view of the interest of the distiller himself. It is his interest to commence with the coming crop, with the supply of corn, with the supply of stock, and to carry it on according to the ordinary course of business without any special stimulant at any portion of the producing season. When he has supplied himself with his hogs and his cattle sufficient to use up the slops, (which is a very important matter in connection with the distilling business,) then it is his interest to go on during that season without any change of the tax, so as to supply his stock uniformly during the whole season until that stock may be disposed of in the market. This is also the interest of the Government, in view of the fact that she has to buy corn, cattle, and hogs to supply the Army.

This is all, Mr. President, that I feel it necessary to say on this subject. It has been very fully discussed, and I ask the Senate to stand by its judgment expressed two months ago.

Mr. POMEROY. I agree with many things that the Senator from Ohio has said; but I would very much prefer to have the question that arises in the fifty-fourth section settled first. If we can raise the tax upon this article on the 1st of July or after the passage of the act, as the Senator from Ohio suggests, to what it is proposed to raise it during the whole year, there would be some good reason why we should not sustain the action of the committee in regard to this section; but I am going to vote to sustain the action of the committee in regard to this section until the fifty-fourth section is settled, and then, if we can correct the legislation in that section, I shall move to reconsider this. I think what tax we put on whisky during the year should be put on it from the 1st of July, or the passage of the act. That is my idea; and then what we tax that on hand will not be injurious to anybody.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, when this question was before the Senate two or three months ago, I voted steadily against taxing the stock on hand. I felt bound to do so on principle. I shall now, however, vote to retain this section as it came from the House of Representatives; and I do it upon this ground: my belief is that the manufacture of domestic spirits will bear a tax of $1 50; I expect to see that tax imposed; and expecting that, I believe the stock on hand may be taxed the amount provided in the section now under consideration, without injustice to the holders, and that the Government can derive a very considerable revenue from it, doing no injustice to any one. I shall, therefore, vote to retain this section, and if afterwards it should turn out that the tax upon the future manufacture is not increased, I shall feel myself at perfect liberty to reverse the vote whenever the opportunity occurs.

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest to the Senator whether we cannot have the other vote taken first.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not care which vote is taken first.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The very reason which induces the Senator from New York to change his vote induces me to adhere to mine—the belief that this article will bear a tax of $1 50. I propose, instead of killing the goose that lays the golden egg, to preserve her. I am satisfied—with great knowledge of this business, having resided in a State where a large amount of this article is manufactured—that taxing the liquor on hand will destroy the distilleries and prevent the manufacture of the article.

Mr. POWELL. I am somewhat amazed at the declaration of the honorable Senator from New York. He announced that he steadily voted against taxing whisky on hand upon principle, and then he announced in the next sentence that he would now vote in favor of taxing whisky on hand. I had thought that principle, correct principle—and there can be no principle except that which is true—never changed. I have steadily voted against taxing whisky on hand. I cast my vote as did the Senator from New York, upon principle, and upon principle I shall steadily continue to vote against it.

I concur with the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Indiana in saying that I do not believe this tax should be imposed, and I do not believe that the whisky-distilling interest will bear a tax of $1 50 a gallon. I think that tax is outrageously high and will be destructive of that interest. I believe that the imposition of a tax upon the stock on hand will also tend much to destroy that interest. The very greatly increased tax which I am certain the Senate will lay on this article of whisky will damage to a great extent the distillers, and the only salvation they will have is in the increased profit they will have on the article on hand.

I put it to the Senate if it is quite honest to tax an article twice. Is it not the duty of every Government, of every honest legislative department, when they make their laws and proclaim to the citizens what they are in order that they may shape their business accordingly, to stand firmly and fairly by what they decreed should be the law touching a particular subject? You have taxed and collected the tax upon a large portion of the whisky that you propose to tax over again; and the reason assigned by my friend from Ohio is that you will not injure these persons in consequence of imposing this double tax upon the whisky. The Senator is certainly mistaken in announcing that you will not injure those persons who hold whisky to the amount of thirty cents a gallon if that is the additional tax you impose on them. Gentlemen seem to think that whisky is something unpopular in the country, and that there is a want of moral odor about it which will allow the men engaged in that interest to be robbed in this kind of way. Sir, you may just as well—and you could do it with as much honesty and integrity on the part of the law-making department of this Government—lay a double tax upon the income of each and every citizen in this land. The Senator from Kansas says it is "confiscation." It is, and that in the most odious form. How would it look before the world if we were to declare by law here that each citizen who was taxed last year under your law should now pay double the amount of income tax that he then paid, and that every other interest which was taxed then should pay now double the amount of tax that was then imposed? Would it be dealing justly with the citizen? Certainly not. It would be grossly unjust.

Mr. RAMSEY. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. Has not whisky doubled in price by our legislation?

Mr. POWELL. I do not know whether it has or not; but if you have by your legislation increased its value, that is no reason for departing from the principle that every Senator must admit to be sound; that is, when you fix a tax on the citizen for any business or profit on any pursuit and collect that tax, you should not turn round and relax him upon the very same thing. I would ask the Senator if he thinks it would be right to put on him another tax of ten dollars in addition to that he paid last year per possibility as attorney-at-law for his license? Would it be proper to make every physician in the country, every shopkeeper in the country, and every person who was taxed for carrying on his business, by way of license pay the same amount over again merely because he had some profit in his business and was able to stand it? If that is to be our rule of legislation we depart from all correct principle, and the citizen will not know what he is to pay. It is proposed to put thirty cents additional tax on each gallon of whisky which has been heretofore taxed; and next year you may think that the $1 50 a gallon which the Senator from Ohio indicates that he wishes to impose is too low, and you may imagine at the next meeting of Congress that it would bear sixty cents more, and you would add sixty cents to it, and so you might continue to tax it until it should be sold and consumed. In my judgment there is no equity or justice in it. I think it is unfair dealing with the citizen. I know that we must have heavy taxes in order to raise revenue; but when we do tax an article, and the party pays the tax, let us not interfere with that article any more; but let us arrange our taxes as to get revenue enough to meet the exigencies of the Government without violating principle.

If you adopt the principle of this section, how will any man in this country know how to arrange his business? If you depart from just principle in regard to the article of whisky, you may with some reason depart from it in every other instance. How with the manufacturer? Under the existing law you charge him, I believe, three per cent. on his profits. Suppose you say that you want money, and that the manufacturing interest has been exceedingly profitable, and can pay more; that they have declared their heavy dividends, that their profits in consequence of the war have been very excessive and great, and therefore you will make the manufacturing interest pay six per cent. in addition to that three per cent., would that be honest or just or right? Certainly not.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. POWELL. Certainly.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. RAMSEY] inquires if whisky has not doubled in price the last year. Has not the distiller had to pay double price for corn and other products out of which whisky is manufactured? Does the Senator not know that to be a fact? After the distiller has bought corn and other products at double price and has distilled whisky, which he has on hand, you propose to say to him that he shall pay thirty cents a gallon upon the whisky that he has manufactured out of the products that he has paid two prices for. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that I have conversed with several distillers from the neighborhood I came from in Indiana, men whom I have known from childhood, and they assure me that this tax will compel them to give up business altogether.

Mr. POWELL. I am obliged to the Senator from Kansas for making the suggestion. I was just about to reach that point.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have no doubt that since the imposition of sixty cents a gallon tax on whisky, corn, as well as all products of the country, has increased in value, but in no proportion at all to the rise in the price of whisky.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I speak now of my own neighborhood. We have one distillery in my own neighborhood in Kansas. Corn was there twenty-five cents a bushel, and now since this rise it is seventy cents a bushel. I know that of my own knowledge.

Mr. POWELL. I can say to the Senator that corn now is $1 05 and $1 10 a bushel in many parts of the valley of the Mississippi. To tax the same article twice is wrong in principle. The Senator from Minnesota asks if whisky has not greatly risen in value. I admit that it has; but I ask him if almost everything else has not risen equally in value. Has he an article of clothing upon his person now that has not trebled or quadrupled in value since the commencement of this civil war? The linen that he wears has quadrupled in value. The manufacturing interest has reaped the profits from that rise. Why not duplicate your taxes upon the manufacturing gentlemen? It would be equally as just to do it as in the case of the whisky makers. The mercantile interests in many parts of the country have been exceedingly prosperous. You may suppose that they are well able to bear taxes. Why not double their taxes? When you have once exacted your tax, and men enter into business of any kind on the faith of it, there is no justice, no equity in afterwards coming in and levying an additional tax; and if this proposition were not advocated by Senators whom I know to be honorable gentlemen, I would say that it was not quite honest. If you enter upon such a system of legislation you cut yourselves loose from all principle. Under such a system no manufacturer, no business man of any kind can pursue any business with security. If you adopt the principle that the tax you lay this year may be duplicated before the end of the year, no sensible business man will know what to do in view of your legislation. Taxes should be laid so as to make them bear as uniformly as possible on the whole people, and laid in such a manner as to allow the business community to know what they have to meet and what they have to pay. Then they can intelligently conduct their pursuits, and they cannot do it otherwise. Suppose you put this thirty cents additional tax upon whisky which has been heretofore taxed, I ask gentlemen who favor the proposition whether if they were manufacturers of whisky they would feel authorized to enter into any business arrangements in view of another meeting of Congress that might so far depart from principle as to impose another tax of thirty or perhaps sixty cents on the same whisky?

I know, sir, that some Senators think the whisky interest will bear any amount of tax. I am not one of those. I think one dollar a gallon is the very outside point to which you ought to go, if you wish to raise the revenue from this interest. Indeed, that is higher than I would go. I believe you will get more revenue from a tax of sixty cents a gallon than a tax of $1.50, or even $1. This interest cannot stand that very great taxation, and it is not just or right that it should.

My friend from Ohio has said that in the latter part of the summer and the early fall months there will be no whisky made if the bill be passed as now proposed; and he assigns as a reason for that opinion that the latter summer and the early fall, up to the 1st of October, is the time when they do not want to feed stock. Now, sir, I have had some little experience in this business of distilling; I have been all my life in the midst of it; and I have observed it. I have also some little experience in feeding stock; and allow me to tell the Senator from Ohio that the stock that are fed, the hogs particularly, are fed in the latter part of the summer and in the early autumn. The hogs that are packed at Cincinnati are fed in the latter part of the summer and the early autumn, and the knives are put to their throats as soon as it is cold enough to keep the pork. From the 1st of August to the middle of October is the time when they are fed, and then they are killed and taken to market. What time is the pork-packing business over in the Senator's great city of Cincinnati? It is over early in the winter. So it is in Louisville; so it is in the great slaughtering places in the valley of the Mississippi. The hogs which are fed after that are killed and carried to market in small lots, and sold as fresh meat and sausages in the large cities.

I heard some Senators the other day in speaking on this subject say that if whisky was not distilled the effect would be to leave the corn on hand to be fed to stock and to be sold to the Government, and that would be a great advantage to the Government, as it has to buy a large amount of provisions now both for man and beast. Senators who entertain that idea are very much mistaken. The slops from the distilleries are worth fully one half the price of the grain originally for feeding hogs and cattle. Any practical distiller will tell you that he relies upon two sources of profit from the distillation of the grain, namely, the price of the whisky and the feeding of the stock; and without both he cannot get on. I venture to say that there is not a distiller in the valley of the Mississippi who would run his distillery a day unless he had these two sources of profit. By stopping the distillation you will not lessen the price of corn much, because in the region of country where the heaviest distilleries are is the corn with which you would have to feed your Army and Army horses; and the transportation of the corn would cost a great deal and bring it up probably to present prices.

In my judgment those who wish to tax this interest so very heavily are mistaken. I do not believe the result will be to secure the amount of revenue that would be derived if the taxation was lower. The proposition to tax the liquor on hand after it has paid one tax, or has complied with your law and is subject to pay the existing duty, is in every respect wrong in principle. I do not believe we should so tamper with any business interest of the country. I will never agree here to lay a tax upon any commodity that has been once taxed, I care not what it be, whether it be whisky or any product of mechanical skill. I would just as soon think of making all professional men take out a license over again, and of taxing every man's income over again, and of taxing every manufacturing interest over again, as to tax this whisky over again. It is such a departure from principle that I cannot think of voting for it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Having expressed my views when this question was up before in favor of imposing a tax upon whisky on hand, and seeing no reason in principle why we should not do so, and not knowing why we may not just as well impose another tax on whisky as to tax a horse one year five dollars and the next year ten dollars, or a tract of land one year five dollars and the next year ten dollars, I shall adhere to my former vote. The Senator from Kentucky says that he will never impose an additional tax on an article that has been once taxed. He does it every twelve months, but there is no principle in its running a year. You may as well tax land twice over in a year, once every six months. I see no principle in it. But, sir, I do not suppose that I shall convince the Senator from Kentucky or anybody else in the Senate by what I have to say in reference to it. It is a question that has been discussed, and probably every Senator has made up his mind in regard to it. I rose simply to ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to strike out this section which proposes a moderate tax of only fifty cents a gallon on the whisky on hand. I hope that we shall not agree to the recommendation of the Committee on Finance, but will retain the section.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to say just one word, in addition to what I have said, on a subject that there seems to be some misunderstanding about by the Senate, and that is the cost to the distiller of the production of liquor. It seems to be understood that the cost is but very trifling. At the present time, and for a great many months past, (and it will be so for a good many months yet to come,) the cost has been very large indeed. At one time the price of corn in the Northwest was very low, from fifteen to thirty cents a bushel; but during this year, because of the large demand for the Army, perhaps, but mainly because of the loss of the last crop to a very considerable extent by reason of an early frost, the price has gone up to very nearly a dollar, from seventy cents up to a dollar, so that the cost is very great. That seems not to be understood.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Senators have expressed their determination to vote for this section one hundred and seventy-eight as it stands. I suggest to them that as it stands it is rather a queer section. It reads:

That all spirits of domestic production and held for sale on the 1st day of May, 1864, and upon which no tax shall have been paid, shall be subject to a duty of fifty cents per gallon, and all such spirits on hand for sale upon which a prior duty shall have been paid shall be subject to a duty of thirty cents per gallon.

It makes a difference between the whisky that has paid the original tax of twenty cents and that upon which nothing has been paid. Some three months ago we imposed an additional tax increasing the rate to sixty cents. The result is that upon all the liquor which has been manufactured, and I suppose it is very large, since then, we should impose an additional tax of thirty cents. That, then, would have to pay ninety cents, while whisky manufactured before would pay only fifty cents. If Senators are satisfied to let it stand so, so be it. That is the effect; an effect most unjust and wrong provided the principle of taxing liquor on hand is to be adopted. I do not propose in any way to amend it myself, because my own opinions have been expressed so decidedly in reference to the thing, that it is wrong in principle, that I shall vote against it in any shape in which it may be put; but if gentlemen desire to have it passed, if they have any expectation that it can be sustained, it strikes me that it is their duty to contrive some way to make the thing just and equal. Now, it is decidedly wrong.

I will not attempt to recapitulate the arguments which I advanced before in relation to the matter. Every Senator understands the question. I will only say that I really wish—I wish as strongly as any person can—that there was some way, consistent with what I believe to be a just and honest principle, to get a revenue out of this large amount of liquor. I believe with the Senator from Ohio that at some time, either now or at a period in the future near at hand, there is to be a lull for a time in this matter, and that for a time we shall get comparatively no revenue from the production of whisky. I believe that is a necessity arising out of the case itself, a difficulty which cannot be got over unless you attempt to get over it by violating the principle of the bill, and what I believe to be an honest and true principle in legislation, and even then you will reach it only imperfectly. You may get a certain amount of money, and there is the end of it, and the question is whether, in getting that money, you have not in such a way violated principle and thrown all dependence upon the regularity of proceedings, upon the system of legislation which Congress may adopt in the future, so entirely into confusion that no men in business can place any sort of reliance upon your legislation. I am very anxious to get money; to get just as much as we can out of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator will recollect that it does not escape the tax. There is a very heavy tax on it. If it be true that the profit upon the whisky on hand is to be very large, just in proportion as it is large is the income of the proprietor increased, and you tax his income.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that. I should be glad to get money out of it, and as much as we can get, and I believe the country needs all we can get; but I am yet to learn that our necessities are so great at this day or are likely to become so great that we are compelled from that consideration alone to shape our legislation merely for the moment, and in violation of what I believe to be a correct and a very important and vital principle of legislation. Nothing is gained by it in the long run, but much is lost; and when I legislate for this country I take it for granted that it is to have a long run, that what we lose at present we more than make up in the future by adhering to a correct system. Therefore I have not changed my opinion on the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to make one observation in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Maine. This section probably will need some amendment. It would not be very difficult to provide for the case suggested by him, and it ought to be transposed to another place in the bill; but I have not offered any amendment because I thought it was better first to take the sense of the Senate on the motion to strike out the section. If the Senate shall refuse to strike out the section it will then be open for amendment, and we can amend it. It would only consume unnecessary time to offer an amendment prior to that. In case the Senate decline to strike out the section I think there may be some slight amendments needed, and it ought to be transposed to that part of the bill which relates to the duties on spirits.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not intend to take up any time in discussing this matter; but the Senator from Maine seems to put this upon what he regards as a violation of principle, and he says it is rendering uncertain the business of the country if we impose a tax upon an article which is on hand and on which no tax has heretofore been laid at all, it seems; for this section applies in part to whisky which has never paid a tax. Does the Senator from Maine consider that it is any violation of principle to assess a tax on an article of property which an individual may hold that has never before been taxed?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will observe that it does not apply so particularly to that as to the other. How much of that there may be is doubtful. It would be very small in quantity.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But so far as that goes—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The principle of the bill, on which the whole system is founded from the beginning, is to tax production solely, and not property, except with reference to a few individual articles which are in their nature permanent, and not consumable.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand that this bill proposes to tax my carriage, my silver-ware, and a variety of articles which were not before taxed. The internal revenue law of 1862 put the first tax on those articles, and if there is any principle in it, that principle is violated just as much in taxing the silver-ware which was not before taxed as in taxing whisky which was not before taxed. It is violated just as much in taxing carriages, and a great variety of articles which are here taxed; and the tax is not put on the production of them, but the owner of the articles is taxed because he owns them and has them. If there is any principle in it, why may we not tax whisky which has not been taxed? The Senator tells us that the principle that he objects to does not apply so much to whisky upon which no tax has been previously levied, as I understand it, as it does to the imposition of an additional tax upon an article which has already paid one tax.

Now, let us see how this bill is in that respect, whether it is proposed to unsettle the business of the country in regard to whisky, and to make it an exception. This bill contains a provision that unsettles the agreements of parties, that declares laws of no effect under which they have been made. There is a provision in this bill that where gas companies have agreed to furnish gas at a certain price, and where the law provides that they shall charge no more for it than that price, yet notwithstanding that be the law, and notwithstanding that be the agreement of the parties, still a certain tax shall be levied upon so many cubic feet of gas and it shall be paid by the consumer, any law or any agreement to the contrary.

When I made that objection the other day, not in reference to gas particularly, but in reference to the provision in the bill which allowed corporations and companies to charge upon the consumer the amount of the tax as an additional price upon the article, I met with a singular answer. I did not reply to it then, because I thought there could be no force in the argument, and I thought the Senator from Maine would see that there was none, and I did not think anybody would suppose there was any until I was spoken to by another Senator who regarded it as a conclusive answer to the objection which I had made. I was told one reason for inserting the clause in the bill was, that an application came from Chicago, that the Chicago gas company was involved in difficulty. I am sure the Senator from Maine did not suppose that that would make any difference with my vote any more than it would with his, whether it came from Chicago or from some other city.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is drawing on his imagination. I will thank him not to judge my kind of argument by the operations of his own mind. Our minds are as distinct as two can be. I gave that as an illustration because it happened to be a good one.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then if the Senator from Maine supposes it would make a difference with me, that his mind is very different from mine—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of course I did not suppose it would make a difference. I say I merely gave it as an illustration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not suppose it would make any difference with the Senator, and I did not suppose he thought it would, or would impute that it would, make any difference with any member of the Senate whether it affected a person in his State or not. I presumed the Senator from Maine would not act from such motives, and would not impute to me that I would. I supposed that, however different and distinct our minds were, on that point at least we should have agreed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator misapprehends me, as I think he always makes a point of doing when he can. I meant to say distinctly that I did not suppose it would have any effect on the Senator's mind. I simply gave it as an illustration because it was a fact.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Coupling it with the expression that our minds were different and therefore we disagreed, thereby imputing that on that point we disagreed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator either did not understand me, or else his remarks are not susceptible of any other construction than that which I have given them.

Now, sir, this bill makes these provisions, and it contains another in regard to advertisements in newspapers. I am not aware that the newspaper proprietors of the country are not as well paid as other business men; I am not aware that they do not get as fair compensation for advertisements as men engaged in other business get for their labor; and yet there is a provision in this bill that a certain tax shall be imposed upon newspaper advertisements, and another provision in it that that additional tax shall be paid by the person inserting the advertisement, any law to the contrary notwithstanding. Although the law of the State of Maine or of my State may provide that for a legal advertisement a certain sum shall be paid, or not exceeding a certain sum, the officer who inserts that advertisement in a paper, by the provisions of this bill, is to be charged an additional sum, any State law to the contrary notwithstanding. And yet we are told when an attempt is made to impose a tax upon whisky on hand, an article that the speculators of this country have been engaged in making money out of upon the legislation of Congress, "you must not touch it, because you will unsettle the business of the country."

Now, sir, I see no principle that is to be violated by imposing a tax upon the whisky on hand. I look upon it as simply a question whether speculators shall make money off the distresses of the country and out of the legislation of the country and put it in their pockets, or whether the Government of the United States shall derive a revenue from this species of property. That, sir, is, as it seems to me, the real question. I know that the cities have been full of these operators, at least I am so told, purchasing large quantities of this article in anticipation that Congress would put a tax upon it that would raise its price in the market and they thereby realize fortunes.

I did not intend to say so much, but it does seem to me that there is no principle in the way of the imposition of a tax upon whisky on hand, especially that which has paid no tax, and that there is the greatest propriety in the imposition of such a tax.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not regard this matter of imposing a tax upon liquor which has never paid any tax as of the slightest consequence in connection with the question, because it cannot be supposed that there is any such amount of it in the country as would afford any revenue worth speaking of. Very nearly two years have elapsed since the original bill went into operation, and although undoubtedly there may have been some quantity of liquor held over by rich men, it is most probable that the liquor which was then on hand and which did not come within the tax we first laid has for the greater part been consumed; and the real question is in regard to that which has been made since and upon which taxes have been levied. I attach very little consequence, therefore, to that part of the argument.

I think I am perfectly safe in saying that if gentlemen who have been in favor of this proposition had supposed that all its effect was to derive revenue from that whisky which had never been taxed they would not have thought of laying it, for the simple reason that the additional expense of hunting up the article and collecting the tax would about eat up all they could get, or drink up all they could get. [Laughter.] I therefore attach no consequence to it; and as I said before, the general principle of the bill is to tax production and not to tax property. I supposed the Senator from Illinois was aware that in most systems of legislation it has been thought advisable to take certain kinds of articles out of the general rule. For myself, I doubted the expediency of laying any taxes on articles of jewelry, watches, &c. I thought very little would be got by them, and that it would make a feeling in the community that it would lose us in fact more than we gain. I remain of the same opinion; but still it is not unusual to tax watches and jewelry and plate and a few things of that sort, taking them out of the general rule. They are not in their nature what are called consumable articles; they are not like clothing and liquors and those things which are worn and eaten and drank. They are of a totally distinct character, and they are rather an exception to the bill than forming any rule.

Now, sir, as to the other matter the Senator and I differed on as to our views. I thought that the additional tax should be borne in certain cases by the purchaser, and that Congress should relieve against the effects of its own legislation, and had the power to relieve against it. I take it that is a very distinct question from the one we are now considering, and affords no illustration. As to my remark there certainly shall be no misunderstanding between my friend from Illinois and myself on that subject. He entirely misunderstood me. I do say, and I repeat—and that is what my remark had reference to—that in matters of opinion upon questions of this description he and I generally differ; our minds seem to run in different grooves; but that breaks no squares between myself and my friend. He has his mode of reasoning and I have mine. We reason, perhaps, on different principles. It does not become me to say, and I will not say, and I do not think that I am any more likely to be right than he is. I only say that we are both fixed and stubborn and obstinate in our opinions, and are not very likely to come together; and I think he is as stubborn as I am, and that is perhaps carrying him a considerable distance further than he goes. But when you come to the question of voting, I repeat that I only suggested the Chicago case because it was an illustration in my mind, and I gave it as an illustration. There were two cases, one at Chicago and one at Philadelphia. I never dreamed that it would affect the honorable Senator's vote; because I will admit that however much we may differ in the operations of our minds, I hope that in our motives of action and our conscientious convictions of right we are very near together. At any rate, I will say that I shall be quite well satisfied with myself when, in that particular, I approach the standard which I think the honorable Senator always sustains with reference to questions of right and his motives of action.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the honorable member from Illinois is confounding things that are clearly distinct. He says that we are taxing again what is already taxed by this bill, and he has mentioned a good many instances in which that is being done; but this is not a tax on liquor before taxed, it is a tax upon the trade, upon the business of making spirits and the business of selling them; it is a license, therefore, to trade. I ask the honorable member if he knows an instance in which a State has licensed a trade within her limits, and has, during the period for which the license is to run according to its terms, increased the license fee. The man who engages in the business for which the license is granted makes up his mind to engage in it and on a consideration of the expense to which he is to be subjected by the Government, and the Government tells him, "If you will pay us fifty or one hundred dollars we will grant you a license to carry on your trade." After having induced him to engage in the trade by telling him, "Pay the money and you shall have that privilege," you turn around the next day and say, "No, you must stop; you shall not carry on the trade at all; you may keep your $100, unless you will pay us $100 more." That does not seem to be right in point of morals; and it is decidedly wrong in point of policy. I think the history of the commercial world will prove that duties, when imposed, which operate in the nature of a license are never increased so as to affect importations made under the old rate of duty. It is impossible, as the honorable member, the chairman of the committee, says, for the business man to know what to do under such a system. He knows to-day that he is liable to pay one rate of duty, but he is warned that it may be possible, such is the unsteadiness of legislation where such a system is resorted to, that before his goods arrive he may be made to pay five times or ten times the amount.

I think, therefore, that the honorable member is mistaken in supposing that there is any analogy between a tax upon the advertisements that may appear in newspapers or a tax upon horses and carriages, and the license fee (for it is a license fee) which is provided for in the section which we propose to strike out. It is not a tax on the whisky according to the value of the commodity. You do not ask the whisky to be appraised and say you will levy a tax of one, two, three, four, or five per cent. on the appraisement. That is what you do not propose to do; but you say, "No matter what the whisky is worth, you shall not make it, you shall not sell it unless you pay us a greater license for making and selling than we have already said if you will pay us you may make and sell the whisky."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Foster, Hendricks, Hicks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wiley—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Dixon, Foot, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wilson—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Doolittle, Harding, Henderson, Morrill, Riddle, Sprague, Wade, and Wright—9.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have gone through with the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance, with a few exceptions, which have been passed over, and those questions may need a little further examination. There is only one thing that I care to act upon to-day, and it is a matter of indifference to me in fact whether the Senate act upon it now or not, and that is the question in regard to bullion. The committee have several other important amendments under consideration which need considerable examination, and we are not prepared to go further with the bill to-day. I understand that an executive session is desired, and I am therefore entirely at the disposal of the Senate as to whether the bill shall now be thrown open for general amendments or whether we shall go into executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one section that the Senator has probably overlooked, that in relation to the tax on carriages.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was not passed over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood that it was. Mr. FESSENDEN. No; I think all the amendments to that section were adopted. Now, as it is three o'clock and it is desirable to have an executive session, I am willing that that shall take place if the result of it will be that the bill does not lose its precedence but will come up regularly as the order of the day on Monday. I desire to ask of the Chair if the effect of our going into executive session now will be to leave the bill the order of the day for Monday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I submit the motion that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I rise to ask the Senator from Maine to withdraw his motion so that I may ask for the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 8, which has been discussed and upon which I suppose there will not be any more debate. It is a joint resolution providing for the payment to the State of Wisconsin of her five per cent. upon the proceeds of the sales of the public lands within her limits. As that measure relates to a State, and I think it is entirely right, I desire to have it disposed of soon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot yield to that, because if I should do so the effect would be to lose the precedence which I wish to retain for the revenue bill, to have it taken up on Monday at one o'clock as the order of the day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Of course I do not want to interfere with that bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But it will necessarily lose its precedence if I give place to other business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall not insist on my request now, hoping to have an opportunity on Monday morning to call up the joint resolution to which I have referred.

Mr. CONNESS. For two weeks past I have been very desirous to call up a bill affecting the State of California, and I have watched the slow proceedings of the Senate on the joint resolution of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] affecting the District of Columbia, which seems to lie in the way of all business, yet—

Several SENATORS. We have passed that to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My friend from California is hardly in order. The motion is that we go into executive session.

Mr. CONNESS. I am aware of that; but I should like to have the bill to which I have referred made the special order for the morning hour on Monday, or a portion of the morning hour, when the Senate will be full.

Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. HENDRICKS. What is the bill?

Mr. CONNESS. It is Senate bill No. 109. I think we can soon get a vote on it after we take it up.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The joint resolution which I desire the Senate to take up has been before the Senate on two or three occasions.

Mr. CONNESS. So has this bill. It has been partially considered, and has been lying on the table for nearly two months. I am very desirous to obtain action upon it, but as the Senator from Indiana preceded me with his notice, I will agree not to trench on his rights.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator is very clever.

Mr. CONNESS. I move with the consent of the Senate that the bill to which I have referred be made the special order for Monday morning at half past twelve o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have always insisted that the morning hour should not be made the subject-matter of special orders.

Mr. CONNESS. I was aware of that, and I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Vermont to agree to the proposition I have suggested. I have named a time in the middle of the morning hour, at half past twelve o'clock. I have labored here to get this bill up; but the floor has been occupied morning after morning—

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator be kind enough to tell us what the bill is?

Mr. CONNESS. It is Senate bill No. 109, relating to land surveys in California. Do I understand the Senator from Vermont to object to my motion?

Mr. COLLAMER. It is not in my power to do more than state that I think the morning hour should not be made the subject of special orders.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall ask it only in this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from California can be entertained only by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONNESS. With the consent of the Senator from Maine I will name one o'clock, and agree not to trench on the tax bill. If this bill shall lead to any considerable debate, I will let it go over.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not mean that my saying that I do not think the bill should be a special order in the morning hour is to prevent the motion being made.

Mr. CONNESS. I supposed so; but I was aware that it was not exactly a proper motion to be made, but I consider that I have been somewhat cheated out of the time by the interminable joint resolution relating to the District of Columbia.

Mr. COLLAMER. If it rests with me simply, I withdraw any objection that I may be supposed to have made, and the Senator may try the question with the Senate to see whether they will make his bill a special order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot consent to anything which displaces the revenue bill; the Senator from California is aware of that, and I have no doubt he does not desire to do it.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say to the honorable Senator from Maine that if the bill which I move to take up shall occupy any considerable time when it is taken up, I will consent to let it go over.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But by agreeing to this proposition I should be simply displacing this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I name half past twelve o'clock on Monday.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether, if the Senator's bill be made the special order for half past twelve o'clock, it will displace the revenue bill at one o'clock?

Mr. CONNESS. I will agree that it shall not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that a special order for half past twelve o'clock must yield at one o'clock to the unfinished business of the preceding session of the Senate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California to assign the bill mentioned by him as the special order for half past twelve o'clock on Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 30, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. T. EDDY, D. D., of Chicago, Illinois.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of acting assistant surgeons in the United States Army, praying for an increase of their compensation, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of John Pridgeon and others, citizens of Michigan, praying that an American enrollment may be granted to the Canadian-built propeller Michigan, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARLAN presented the petition of Henry Rudd, praying for reimbursement for losses sustained by him under a contract for supplying the Government with horses; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of James J. Johnson, praying for compensation for services rendered as veterinary surgeon of the fourth Iowa cavalry; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the second annual report of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, showing the condition of its affairs on the 1st day of March, 1864, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Eliza Donnelly and Miss Sarah Donnelly, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 314) for the relief of Harriet and Emily W. Morris, unmarried sisters of the late Henry W. Morris, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 419) for the relief of Peter Anderson, of the District of Columbia, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE BILL DAY.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I offer the following resolution in reference to the order of business on Friday:

Resolved, That the session of Friday next, after the morning hour, be devoted to the consideration of private bills upon the Calendar, in their order.

Mr. SUMNER. Let that lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 450) to provide for the repair and preservation of certain public works of the United States; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 65) to provide for the payment of the claims of Peruvian citizens under the convention between the United States and Peru of the 12th of January, 1863; and

A bill (S. No. 248) in relation to franked matter.

ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

Mr. ANTHONY. Some days ago the Committee on Printing reported a resolution for printing five hundred copies of the report of the Academy of Sciences. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] objected to the consideration of the resolution. I understand he has withdrawn his objection. It is desirable, if it is to be printed at all, that it be printed at once, and I therefore move that the Senate take up the resolution and dispose of it now.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That five hundred additional copies of the report of the president of the National Academy of Sciences be printed and bound for the use of the Senate.

The resolution was adopted.

WILLIAM YOCUM.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the resolution that I offered on the 29th of March last in relation to the pardon and imprisonment of William Yocum be now taken up.

Mr. WILSON. I am inclined to think that if the Senator from Kentucky will wait a day or two an answer will come to the call that has already been made. I was told at the War Office a day or two ago that the papers had just been ordered from the Attorney General's office to the War Office.

Mr. DAVIS. I will acquiesce in that suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

PAY OF PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. FOOT. I ask the Senate to postpone all prior orders and take up Senate bill No. 199, relating to the compensation of pension agents.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that there shall be paid, over and above the compensation now allowed by law, to every pension agent disbursing $50,000 annually, not exceeding $500 per annum for clerk hire, rent of office, and office expenses; and to every agent disbursing $100,000 annually, not exceeding $750 per annum; and for every $50,000 additional, not exceeding $250 per annum for those purposes; but in no case is the amount of compensation to any one agent to exceed the sum of $3,500.

The Committee on Pensions reported the bill with an amendment in line thirteen, to strike out "$3,500" and insert "$4,000;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That in no case shall the amount of compensation to any one agent exceed the sum of $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT. I will simply say that this bill has been fully and carefully considered by the Committee on Pensions, and has their unanimous approval, and is in accordance with the recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

LAND TITLES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CARLILE. I move the postponement of all prior orders for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 238, to ascertain and settle certain private land claims in California.

Mr. CONNESS. I object.

Mr. HALE. I hope that bill will not be taken up, as I understand it will give rise to debate. The Senator from California is opposed to it. I think the Senator from Virginia had better withdraw the motion at present.

Mr. CARLILE. I should like very much to comply with the request of the Senator from New Hampshire; but it is a bill that was here for some time before the Committee on Public Lands, and it has been some time since it was reported, and I am anxious to have it disposed of. I do not see how it can lead to much discussion, because it is upon a subject that has been acted upon by this body before. A similar bill was passed by the Senate at the last session. I do not myself propose to take up much time in its discussion.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection that this bill shall be taken up and made the special order for some time to be designated; but I object to its being taken up now to the exclusion of important business. It is a bill, in my opinion, that never can pass; at least it never should pass; and I shall be prepared at any time when it is taken up to give abundant reasons why it should not pass. That it cannot be discussed and passed upon this morning is quite certain. We have made special orders for the morning hour to-day. There are two appointed, I believe. I dislike to be placed in the position of objecting to a motion made by my friend the Senator from Virginia; but I will say to that Senator it is quite impossible that his measure can be acted upon without discussion, and considerable discussion too; for I apprehend it involves even more than the Senator, although he has considered it, has had time to understand, and therefore I object to its being taken up now. I am quite willing, nay, I am very anxious that it shall be taken up and disposed of at some early period, because I do not want it to hang here in the Senate forming a cloud upon the title to lands in California.

Mr. CARLILE. Will the Senator before he takes his seat allow me to ask him if he will make a motion to make it a special order for some time that will suit his convenience and the convenience of other Senators?

Mr. CONNESS. I am not sufficiently interested in its well-being to do that. If the Senator who has charge of the bantling will undertake that, I will accord with his suggestion, whatever it is.

Mr. CARLILE. I have no interest in the world in this proposition other than to discharge my duty as a member of this body and as a member of the Committee on Public Lands. In reporting the bill it was accompanied by a report from the committee which has been laid upon the desks of Senators, and I will content myself with the reading of that report. If it is agreeable, however, to the Senate to have the bill made the special order for some future day, I am disposed to let it take that course, and I suggest Wednesday or Thursday or any other day this week.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to making a special order of any bill of this character at this stage of the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on taking up the bill.

Mr. HALE. I guess we had better not take it up.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 17, noes 9.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to postpone the consideration of the bill just taken up until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock, with a view, I desire to state, of taking up Senate joint resolution No. 8, for the relief of the State of Wisconsin, to which I called the attention of the Senate on Saturday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the bill now before the Senate be postponed to and made the special order for half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Indiana says he makes the motion with a view to take up a certain joint resolution which he names. I shall vote for his motion with a view to take up another joint resolution which is before the Senate and ought to be considered, and that is the joint resolution for the relief of the contractors for the machinery of the gunboats known as "double-enders." I shall give the same vote as the Senator, but with a different view.

Mr. COLLAMER. I cannot but again feel it my duty to protest against making special orders within the morning hour. I hope gentlemen will not consent to make any special order whatever within the morning hour.

Mr. SUMNER. I agree with the Senator from Vermont, and I think in relation to the bill that is now pending it would be enough if we vote to postpone it generally, without undertaking to fix any particular time for its consideration. There are several matters, one or two that I am interested in myself, that I should like to move to take up to-morrow, and there are also other Senators around me who are desirous of moving to take up other propositions; and yet if we fix a special order for half past twelve o'clock to-morrow our hands will be tied.

Mr. CARLILE. I am anxious to facilitate the business of the Senate, but I believe that if the Senate will enter upon the consideration of this bill at this time the probabilities are that we shall dispose of it much earlier than we shall after taking it up by postponing it and making it a special order. My experience is that special orders really interfere with business and tend to delay rather than to facilitate it. I will content myself by simply asking that the Clerk read the report which accompanies the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read, unless objection be made.

Mr. CONNESS. I object. In less than ten minutes the time fixed for the consideration of the special order for this morning will arrive, and I therefore object to proceeding with this bill now. I object to this bill obtaining precedence over other important business. It is a bill, as I have said before, that should not pass. I shall be fully prepared to show that. I do not know of any reason why it should get a special preference in its consideration. I suggest to the honorable Senator that its consideration be made the special order at some future day. Half past twelve o'clock to-morrow is not the only time that can be named.

Let the Senator name a day at the end of the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia having called for the reading of the report and objection being made, the Chair will submit the question to the Senate, shall the report be read?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before proceeding with that question, I wish to say that I regret very much that the Senator from Indiana should have made the motion he has made. We never can do any business under such a practice. I understand the Senate to have voted, on a division, to take up the bill indicated by the Senator from Virginia. Am I right? If I am that matter has been taken up by a vote of the Senate; and the moment it is up another Senator rises and moves to postpone that bill and take up another. Suppose the motion of the Senator from Indiana should be carried: as soon as it is carried the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] who has two or three matters in charge that he is very anxious about, may rise and move to postpone the resolution called up by the Senator from Indiana, and take up one of his bills. Shall we ever do any business in that way?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Illinois that the question is not to postpone the bill under consideration simply, but to postpone it and make it a special order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; but that motion is made immediately after we have taken up the bill. The Senate, on a division, as the Senator from Indiana will observe, the question being made, resolved to postpone all other orders and take up the bill indicated by the Senator from Virginia. The moment that bill is taken up by a vote of the Senate, the Senator from Indiana rises and moves to take up something else. Can we ever do any business in that way? We should either adhere to the bill of the Senator from Virginia after we have taken it up, or else we ought not to have taken it up at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois, inasmuch as he criticises my motion, how the motion could be made to postpone until the bill was taken up?

Mr. TRUMBULL. A majority of the Senate decided to take up the bill indicated by the Senator from Virginia. If a majority had refused to take up the Senator's bill, then the Senator from Indiana could have called up his. He should have voted in the negative, as he probably did, on the motion of the Senator from Virginia; but a majority of the Senate disagreed with him; they agreed to take up the bill of the Senator from Virginia. Having taken it up, the Senator from Indiana moves to postpone it. The motion of the Senator from Virginia was to postpone everything, and proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him. The Senate so decided; and the moment they so decided the Senator from Indiana asks to postpone that bill and everything else, and take up some measure that he indicates. We shall never accomplish any business if that practice prevails. I hope, therefore, the Senator from Virginia, having succeeded in getting his measure up, will obtain some action upon it.

Mr. HOWE. The question put to the Senator from Illinois is not answered yet; and that is, how this motion to postpone the bill of the Senator from Virginia and make it a special order could possibly have been made before the bill was taken up. The complaint is that after the Senate has voted to proceed to the consideration of a bill a motion is interposed to set the bill down as a special order for a certain time. That is the motion of the Senator from Indiana. How could that motion have been made before the bill was taken up?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not object particularly to that portion of the motion proposing to make the bill a special order; but I do object to this practice of following one motion by another, one immediately after the other. I do not understand, however, that the Senator from Indiana has made a motion to make the bill a special order.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; his motion was to postpone the bill until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock. I do not think he said anything about making it a special order. That was just such a motion as had been before made by the Senator from Virginia. If the Senator from Indiana succeeds with his motion, I can make a motion to postpone and take up a bill that I have in charge.

Mr. CARLILE. There is a special order, as I understand, for half past twelve o'clock this morning, and as I am anxious to accommodate the Senate and particularly the Senator from California, I am willing that this bill may lie on the table, but I give notice that I shall call it up on Wednesday morning.

Mr. CONNESS. I am much obliged to the Senator. I am equally anxious to act on this bill that it may be finally and definitely disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders and take up Senate joint resolution No. 50, for the relief of the contractors for the machinery of the side-wheel gunboats known as double-enders.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest to the honorable Senator that the hour has now arrived, or it is within a minute of it, fixed for the consideration of the special order, and I hope we shall be allowed to go on with that bill, as it was made the special order for this morning, and let the Senator come in next after that.

Mr. HALE. I will inquire whether there is any such thing as "unfinished business" in the morning hour?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is often business unfinished, but it does not come up as a matter of course.

Mr. HALE. I want to state what this resolution is, and then I will leave it to the Senate to decide. It is a resolution for the relief of the builders of the steam engines of the gunboats known as "double-enders." I have here both the letters of the Secretary of the Navy on the subject. I think the Senate owes it to the country and to these men to dispose of their case, if they mean to do anything for them, and if they do not they should let them know it.

Mr. CONNESS. I put it to the Senator again to allow me to go on with the bill that has been made the special order. It has been lying on the table for two months partially acted upon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe there was an understanding between the Senator from California and myself on Saturday that the joint resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin, which is somewhat under my charge, should take precedence of his bill. I interposed no objection to his motion, but suggested to the Senator that that should be the course; it seemed to be the general understanding. I therefore move that the consideration of his bill be suspended informally until we can take a vote on that resolution. I do not propose to discuss it at any length. I merely wish to make a suggestion or two.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of half past twelve o'clock having arrived, the Chair will call up for consideration the special order for this hour, being the bill (S. No. 109) to expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the State of California.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My motion is—

Mr. CONNESS. Let me say a word to the Senator. I will stand by my agreement, and if the Senator insists on that order of proceeding I shall certainly not object; but I want to make an appeal to him. I think a vote can be taken on this bill without discussion; I hope so; and then it will occupy but a few moments. It has been reported by the Committee on Public Lands; the chairman of that committee is in his seat, and I think it will occupy but a few minutes if we proceed with it now; but if the Senator insists I shall certainly give way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 109 is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] informs me that there will be discussion on this bill. If there is discussion, I will appeal to the Senator from California—

Mr. CONNESS. I will allow the Senator to have his way on that subject. I simply ask his indulgence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand whether the Senator from Indiana moved the postponement of the bill or not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from California suggests that a vote can be taken on this bill at once. If so, I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands to the bill as amended.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let it be read.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest that it has been read once. It is a long bill. It is a substitute offered by the committee and moved by them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read again unless there be objection.

Mr. BUCKALEW. What is the title of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "A bill to expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the State of California."

Mr. SHERMAN. I think a bill like that ought to be read at any rate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read again unless there be objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand it has been read.

Mr. CONNESS. It has been. Let me state that the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands has some amendments to offer.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to hear the reading of so important a bill as that. It ought to be read three times by the rule. I want to hear it once at least.

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on Public Lands report a bill in the nature of a substitute. Perhaps the reading of that will suffice.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all I desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows: Strike out all after the enacting clause of the original bill, and insert:

"That whenever the surveyor general of California shall, in compliance with the thirteenth section of an act entitled 'An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California,' approved March 3, 1851, have caused any private land claim to be surveyed and a plat to be made thereof, he shall give notice that the same has been done by a publication, once a week for four consecutive weeks, in two newspapers, one published in the city of San Francisco and one published near the land surveyed; and shall retain in his office, for public inspection, the survey and plat until ninety days from the date of the first publication in San Francisco shall have expired; and if no objections are made to said survey, he shall approve the same, and transmit a copy of the survey and plat thereof to the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington, who shall immediately, upon receipt, proceed to examine the same; but if objections are made to said survey within the said ninety days, by any party claiming to have an interest in the tract embraced by the survey, or in any part thereof, such objections shall be reduced to writing, stating distinctly the interest of the objector; and signed by him or his attorney, and filed with the surveyor general, together with such affidavits or other proofs as he may produce in support of the objections. At the expiration of said ninety days the surveyor general shall transmit to the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington, a copy of the survey and plat, and objections, and proofs filed with him in support of the objections; and also of any proofs produced by the claimant and filed with him in support of the survey, together with his opinion thereon; and the said Commissioner shall, immediately upon receipt, proceed to examine the same; and if the survey and plat are approved by him he shall indorse thereon a certificate of his approval. If objections are made to such survey and plat by the said Commissioner, he may require a further report from the surveyor general of California touching the matters objected to, or proofs to be taken thereon, or may direct a new survey and plat to be made. Whenever the objections are disposed of, or the survey and plat are corrected, or a new survey and plat are made in conformity with his directions, he shall indorse upon the survey and plat adopted his certificate of approval. After the survey and plat have been, as hereinbefore provided, approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, it shall be the duty of the said Commissioner to cause a patent to issue to the claimant as soon as practicable after such approval.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the preceding section shall apply to all surveys and plats by the surveyor general of California, heretofore made, which have not already been approved by one of the district courts of the United States for California, or by the Commissioner of the General Land Office: Provided, That where proceedings for the correction or confirmation of a survey are pending on the passage of this act in one of the said district courts, it shall be lawful for such district court to proceed and complete its examination and determination of the matter, and its decision thereon shall be subject to appeal to the circuit court of the United States for the district in like manner and with like effect as hereinafter provided for appeals in other cases to the circuit court, and such appeals may be in like manner disposed of by the said court.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That where a plat and survey have already been approved or corrected by one of the district courts of the United States for California, and an appeal from the decree of approval or correction has already been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, the said Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the appeal; but where from such decree of approval or correction no appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court, no appeal to that court shall be allowed, but an appeal may be taken within twelve months after this act shall take effect to the circuit court of the United States for California, and said circuit court shall proceed to fully determine the matter. The said circuit court shall have power to affirm or reverse or modify the action of the district court, or order the case back to the surveyor general for a new survey. When the case is ordered back for a new survey, the subsequent survey of the surveyor general shall be under the supervision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and not of the district or circuit court of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That whenever the district judge of any one of the district courts of the United States for California is interested in any land the claim to which, under the said act of March 3, 1851, is pending before him, on appeal from the board of commissioners created by said act, the said district court shall order the case to be transferred to the circuit court of the United States for California, which court shall thereupon take jurisdiction and finally determine the same. The said district courts may also order a transfer to the said circuit court of any other cases arising under said act pending before them, affecting the title to lands within the corporate limits of any city or town, and in such cases both the district and circuit judges may sit.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all the right and title of the United States to the lands within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco, as defined by the act incorporating said city, passed by the Legislature of said State on the 15th of April, 1851, are hereby relinquished and granted to the said city and its successors, for the uses and purposes specified in the ordinance of said city, ratified by an act of the Legislature of the said State, approved on the 11th of March, 1850, entitled "An act concerning the city of San Francisco, and to ratify and confirm certain ordinances of the common council of said city," there being excepted from this relinquishment and grant all sites or other parcels of lands which have been or now are occupied by the United States for military, naval, or other public uses, or such other sites or parcels may hereafter be designated by the President of the United States, within one year after the rendition to the General Land Office by the surveyor general of an approved plat of the exterior limits of San Francisco as recognized in this section, in connection with the lines of the public surveys: And provided, That the relinquishment and grant by this act shall in no manner interfere with or prejudice any bona fide claims of others, whether asserted adversely under rights derived from Spain, Mexico, or the laws of the United States, nor preclude a judicial examination and adjustment thereof.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the surveyor general of California to cause all the private land claims finally confirmed to be accurately surveyed and plats thereof to be made, whenever requested by the claimants: Provided, That each claimant requesting a survey and plat shall first deposit in the district court of the district within which the land is situated a sufficient sum of money to pay the expenses of such survey and plat, and of the publication required by the first section of this act. Whenever the survey and plat requested shall have been completed and forwarded to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as required by this act, the district court may direct the application of the money deposited, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to the payment of the expenses of said survey and publication.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the surveyor general of California, in making surveys of the private land claims finally confirmed, to follow the decree of confirmation as closely as practicable whenever such decree designates the specific boundaries of the claim; but when such decree designates only the out-boundaries within which the quantity confirmed is to be taken, the location of such quantity shall be made, as near as practicable, in one tract; and if the character of the land, or intervening grants, be such as to render the location impracticable in one tract, then each separate location shall be made, as near as practicable, in a compact form. And it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to require substantial compliance with the directions of this section before approving any survey and plat forwarded to him.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to define and regulate the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States in California, in regard to the survey and location of confirmed private land claims,'" approved June 14, 1850, and all provisions of law inconsistent with this act, are hereby repealed.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the amendment on the 6th page, line eighteen of section one, by striking out after the word "Washington" these words, "who shall, immediately upon receipt, proceed to examine the same;" and inserting in lieu thereof, "for his examination and approval."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the same section in line thirty-two, after the word "thereon," by striking out the words "and the said Commissioner shall, immediately upon receipt, proceed to examine the same."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. In line thirty-four, I move to strike out "him" and insert "said Commissioner."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. In line thirty-five, after the word "if," I move to strike out "objections are made to such survey and plat by the said Commissioner," and to insert in lieu thereof "disapproved by him, or if in his opinion the ends of justice would be subserved thereby."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. In line thirty-eight, I move to strike out the words "objected to," and insert, "indicated by him."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. In the eighth section on the 11th page in the ninth line, after the word "tract," I move to insert "and in a compact form."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. In the fifth section, line nine, I move to strike out the word "finally" before "determine."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to strike out the fourth section of the amendment as reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that it has already been struck out.

Mr. CONNESS. It was struck out when the bill was up before.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is a very important bill, and my attention has only been called to it since it has now been called up, though I believe it has been some time before us. I observe in the bill some peculiar features. I hardly feel at liberty to oppose the bill with the limited information I have in regard to it, and yet I desire to call the attention of the members of the Senate to some singular provisions here. In the third section there is a singular provision, opening all cases that have been decided, no matter how long ago, to an appeal. That is a very strange feature.

Mr. CONNESS. Read the words, if you please.

Mr. TRUMBULL:

That where a plat and survey have already been approved or corrected by one of the district courts of the United States for California, and an appeal from the decree of approval or correction has already been taken to the Supreme Court, the said Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the appeal.

So far very well.

But where from such decree of approval or correction no appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court, no appeal to that court shall be allowed, but an appeal may be taken within twelve months after this act shall take effect to the circuit court of the United States for California, and said circuit court shall proceed to fully determine the matter.

Here there may be a case that was disposed of five years ago; the titles to the purchasers all settled; no appeal taken; and now every such case is opened to an appeal to the circuit court of California, although no appeal has heretofore been taken.

Mr. CONNESS. No. That is not the understanding.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the way it reads. I will read it again:

Where from such decree of approval or correction—

That is, the decree of the district court—

no appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court, no appeal to that court shall be allowed—

The Supreme Court shall never hear it—but an appeal may be taken within twelve months after this act shall take effect to the circuit court of the United States.

When may an appeal be taken? Within twelve months after the passage of this act in all cases in which appeals have not been taken. That is the language. If it does not mean that, I do not know what it does mean.

Mr. CONNESS. This refers not to cases that have been definitely settled, but to cases that are now pending in court. It does not refer to questions of title to land; it refers to the location of land or the determination of land by survey, after the question of title has been determined and settled.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from California will allow me. The language of the first line is "where a plat and survey have already been approved."

Mr. CONNESS. "Or corrected by one of the district courts."

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is where it has been done, not where it is pending.

Mr. CONNESS. If a few words were inserted, the meaning would be made plain to the Senator. It is that where a plat and survey have already been approved or corrected by one of the district courts for California, and an appeal from the decreed of approval or correction has already been taken, those cases shall continue and go to the Supreme Court; but where those cases are pending and an appeal to the Supreme Court has not been taken, an appeal may be taken from the district court to the circuit court; but it reopens nothing; it does not propose to reopen any case. The very contrary is the object and purpose of the entire act. It is to expedite and settle, not to open anything that has been settled. It is simply a provision for disposing of the cases of survey that are now pending in the courts of the United States, and that is all.

This bill, I may as well say, has been before the Senate a long time. It was referred early in the session to the Committee on Public Lands; it was reported by them favorably; it was afterwards recommittees to that committee and again reported favorably by them. The chairman of the committee is in his place. He has given it very close consideration, and it is a bill upon which, in my opinion, the interests of the State that I in part represent here are very deeply involved and depend.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I may be in error about it, but I think the section is not susceptible of the construction which the Senator from California gives it. The language is, "where from such a decree of approval or correction no appeal has been taken"—that refers to cases already decided, not to cases pending. It is in the past tense.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest to the Senator to insert the language "in cases pending."

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator will observe that you cannot appeal from a pending case until it is decided. It would be necessary, I think, to alter the language somewhat, and provide that in all cases hereafter an appeal shall be allowed, but you cannot appeal from a pending case.

Mr. CONNESS. Let me explain again. The Senator seems to misunderstand the whole tenor of this section. The mode of operation is this: the surveyor general of the State, in the first place, surveys the land in question. If there be objections to the plat returned by him to the district court, the district court hears testimony in the case, and inquires into it. If the district court confirms the plat and survey made by the surveyor general, either party may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from that decision. This section refers to those cases in that condition where the district court has been appealed to by one party, and where the plat has been approved by the district court. In that case, where no appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court, this bill provides that the appeal shall be taken and lie in the circuit court for California, simply to expedite and settle, and not to compel persons to come here to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. McDUGALL. I wish that this matter may be understood. Under the original act to settle land titles in California, the act of 1851, after the causes had been adjudicated by the board of commissioners, there was an appeal of course to the district court, and also an appeal provided for to the Supreme Court upon the merits of the claim; but after the right of the claimant had been adjudicated, it was the business of the surveyor general himself to make the survey, and upon the completion of the survey his return was made to the General Land Office and the patent issued as of course.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from California inform me whether heretofore an appeal has lain from the district to the circuit court there?

Mr. McDUGALL. No.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is a new feature.

Mr. McDUGALL. That is a new feature, and I will state the reason for that. In 1860 a law was passed which provided that after the final confirmation of the claim so far as the sufficiency of the title was concerned, and after the survey, the survey might be carried into the district court and there the proper location of the survey contested. The result was that every case was carried into the district court, testimony taken there under its rules, and an appeal to the Supreme Court, and now there remain in the district court and on the way to the Supreme Court nearly all the cases that have been determined upon the merits since 1860. They are probably—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the Senator to call up the order of the day.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the indulgence of the chairman of the Finance Committee for a while. I think we shall get to a vote directly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that the Senator's bill is to be contested; and if I should yield it would be necessarily for some considerable time.

Mr. CONNESS. If it occupies much time I will say to the Senator that I will not ask him to give way.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is aware that if I give way to him I must to others.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not often make an appeal to the Senate. This bill has lain on the table for two months, and we are getting to the end of the session. I hope the Senator from Maine will indulge me this morning by letting us consider it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that the Senator from Maryland will contest this bill, as I understand from him, and I have already given notice to the Senator that I shall contest it myself, and the result will be necessarily the consumption of considerable time.

Mr. McDUGALL. I hope the Senator from Maine will allow me to conclude my remarks by way of explanation. It will take me but a few minutes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Having resisted one appeal, I must insist. I must ask for a motion and let the Senate decide.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall not put a motion to the Senate. What position will this bill occupy if we pass it by?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be liable to be called up on motion; it will not come up as a matter of course.

Mr. CONNESS. Well, sir, I will let it go over.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have in my hand an amendment which has been prepared at the Treasury Department in reference to bullion, which is to come in on page 146 of the bill, at the end of section ninety-three:

On bullion in lump, ingot, bar, or otherwise, a duty of one per cent., which shall be paid by the assayer of the same and be deducted from the amount of coin returned in exchange for such bullion not previously assayed, by any mint or branch mint of the United States; and all assayers shall stamp the product of the assay, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe by general regulations. And every and all sales, except by the miner or producer of gold and silver combined, alloyed, or in union with other metals or substances prior to the same being assayed and duly stamped according to the provisions of this act and the regulations aforesaid, shall be and are hereby made and declared to be invalid and void; and every person or corporation who shall sell, or transfer, or deal in such unstamped gold or silver, or export or attempt to export the same from the United States, shall be subject to a penalty of $1,000, and to a fine not exceeding that sum and to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years: Provided, however, That this prohibition shall not extend to miners or original producers of such gold or silver.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not understand the chairman of the Committee on Finance as moving this amendment as a substitute for the language occurring on the 140th page of the bill, beginning at line three hundred and forty-eight and ending with line three hundred and fifty. I understand him to offer this as an additional proposition, leaving that objectionable feature in the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My idea is that if this is adopted that provision must be struck out.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I suggest that whatever is offered should be offered as a substitute for that language in the bill, and that we proceed in that way.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We cannot very well put it in that place.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I ask the Senator to move first to strike out this language.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the proper way is to see whether the Senate will adopt this amendment before they strike out that clause, because if this is not adopted I would not consent to strike out that.

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose the other cannot remain at any rate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is for the Senate to decide.

Mr. CONNESS. If the other shall remain, I rather think the amount of revenue collected in the mines will be very small.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I say to the Senator that if this amendment is adopted I shall myself move to strike out the other clause to which he refers.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand that, but I do not understand why that mode should be pursued.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because that is the usual mode.

Mr. CONNESS. The amendment offered by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance is very objectionable in one respect, not to say more, in this, that it prohibits and punishes all transactions in gold in its natural state, unassayed and unstamped, within the United States, except when those transactions and sales are made by the producers thereof. There is a large portion of the United States where gold and silver are produced, where there is no coin, where there is no paper issued, where there is no means of commerce but the actual gold as it is produced, and that is used as a medium of exchange, and is weighed by small scales kept by miners for that purpose. The parties with whom they trade take it in exchange for goods at a given amount per ounce. The parties who get it in exchange for goods sell it to those from whom they buy. It is impracticable and impossible for those parties to send it to an assay office to have it assayed and receive the stamp of the United States, so that this provision is equivalent to a prohibition of all commerce in certain sections of the country, and it is simply impracticable and impossible. Having read the amendment, and understanding something about its impracticability, I have rewritten the provision, and I have had it printed, and it has been lying on Senators' desks for several days. I send it up to the desk to be read as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance.

There are other objections to the amendment proposed by him. It contains no provision compelling workers in the precious metals to use stamped bullion, and the result would be that all that portion of the precious metals which goes into articles of ornament and use, which is very great, in the mining sections particularly, would go untaxed. Now, if we are to lay a tax upon the production of gold, I propose that we do not go through the farce of simply imposing a few conditions that will give us all the responsibility against the public opinion of the section of country to which it will apply, and give us no result, or but a partial one, in the way of revenue. I have inserted in my amendment a provision relating to and covering the exportation of ore containing the precious metals, and I have a proviso fixing the time when this general provision regulating the tax on mines shall go into operation, which is also necessary, because if you prohibit transactions in bullion unless it be stamped, and require at the same time that a particular stamp shall be impressed upon it, you want a sufficient length of time allowed to enable the Treasury Department to adopt its regulations and furnish to the assay offices the stamp provided before it goes into operation, otherwise you would be exposing all these persons to criminal prosecution and severe penalties. I send my amendment to the Chair, and ask that it be read, and I offer it in lieu of the amendment of the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The Senator from California proposes to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, by striking out all after the word "on," and inserting what will be read.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

On bullion in lump, ingot, bar, or otherwise, a duty of — per cent. ad valorem, to be paid by the assayer of the same, who shall stamp the product of the assay as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe by general regulations. And every and all sales, transfers, exchanges, transportation, and exportation of gold or silver assayed, any mint of the United States, or by any private assayer, unless stamped as prescribed by general regulations, as aforesaid, is hereby declared unlawful; and every person or corporation who shall sell, transfer, transport, exchange, or deal in the same shall be subject to a penalty of $1,000 for each offense, and to a fine not exceeding that sum, and to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years nor less than six months. No jeweler, worker, or artificer in gold and silver, shall use either of those metals except it shall have first been stamped as aforesaid, as required by this act; and every violation of this section shall subject the offender to the penalties contained herein. No person or corporation shall take, transport, cause to be transported, export, or cause to be exported from the United States any gold or silver in its natural state, uncut, or unassayed, and unstamped, as aforesaid; and for every violation of this provision every offender shall be subject to the penalties contained herein: Provided, That the foregoing subdivision of this section providing for a tax on gold and silver shall only be in force from and after sixty days after the passage of this act.

Mr. NESMITH. The amendment offered by the Senator from California removes a very great objection in my mind to the one offered by the chairman of the Committee on Finance. That practically prohibits any dealing in, any transfer of, gold in its natural state. If that amendment should be adopted, it would bear exceedingly hard on a very large portion of my constituents, as well as on the people of Washington Territory and the Territory of Idaho, and as I apprehend on the people of the interior portions of California. That amendment admits of only one transfer of gold in its natural state. It provides that the miners who produce gold may sell or dispose of it in that condition, but it absolutely prohibits and renders null and void, and renders the parties subject to fine, who shall make any sale or disposition of it afterwards before it has passed an assay office. The interior of the country, the great gold-producing districts in the eastern portion of Oregon and the mountainous region of California and in Idaho and Washington Territories are entirely destitute of assay offices. The consequence would be that gold in its natural state would be prohibited from being made the circulating medium. The miner might take his gold and sell it, and that would be the only possible transfer that could be made. The custom or usage there has been since the discovery of the mines, that gold dust at a certain fixed price has been the circulating medium of the miners, passing from one to another; and every miner and every trader carries the scales about with him, prepared to weigh and use the dust as a circulating medium in that condition.

If the provision which is incorporated in the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Finance shall be adopted that trade will be entirely cut off, and any man who attempts to use gold dust in that way in its unrefined, unassayed state becomes subject to a penalty. I will illustrate. The small traders in the interior of the country are generally the men who purchase the dust from the hands of the miners for supplies and sometimes for coin. That transaction is rendered legitimate and legal by the amendment of the Senator from Maine, but it is impossible for the man who purchases that dust to make another transfer of it until he takes it to an assay office, and in the great interior districts to which I have referred there are no assay offices. You have to get into the civilized and older-settled sections of the country before you can reach an assay office where your gold can be reduced to that condition in which you can legally make a transfer of it. The large wholesale establishments in San Francisco or any of the great towns on the Pacific coast sell their goods to dealers in the mining regions and exchange them for gold dust in the hands of the miners. The wholesale merchant goes there to make his collections, and he expects to make his collections in gold dust, the natural product of the country and the only thing which they have to pay for the goods. By the amendment of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, one transfer having been made from the miner to the trader, that trader would be prohibited from paying his debts in the only material which he has on hand, or which he can possibly acquire, gold dust being the only circulating medium. He is prohibited, as I say, by this provision from making another transfer to pay a legitimate debt for the goods which he originally purchased and which he has sold to get possession of the gold. I think that provision ought to be stricken out. If it be enacted into a law it will paralyze all trade in the interior. A man having $1,000 in gold dust in the interior of Idaho, or Washington, or Oregon, located a thousand or fifteen hundred miles from an assay office, cannot be expected to send or carry that dust to an assay office to have it stamped and its exact value ascertained and pay this tax to the Government before he is permitted to use it. The gold must eventually find its way there, and the amendment which the Senator from California has offered prohibits its exportation from the country in its crude condition. Therefore when it is taken out of the country it must inevitably be assayed. If this transaction be permitted to be continued, the Government will lose nothing; it will not interfere with the daily transactions in the mining regions in transferring gold from one to another. It must in the end inevitably pass the assay offices before it leaves the country.

The only practical effect of that provision in the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee will be to paralyze trade and prohibit the usual transactions which are constantly and every day being made in that country. To us in Oregon, Washington, and Idaho the nearest assay office is at San Francisco. It is fifteen hundred or two thousand miles from the great gold-producing regions of the interior to a Government assay office. In order to take the dust there, and have it reduced to bullion, and get the assay, and obtain the Government stamp, the party owning it must necessarily be out of its use for three or four months, in addition to paying an expense equal to eight or ten per cent. to get it transferred to the assay office and back, to say nothing about the risk and danger of loss in the transportation.

I think the proposition is so clear that there can be no possible objection to the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from California in lieu of the one offered by the chairman of the Committee on Finance. As I stated before, the Government cannot possibly be defrauded at all or lose any of its revenue by that amendment, while the people will be greatly accommodated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think I shall offer any objection to the general form in which this has been put by the Senator from California. The amendment which I offer, as I stated, was drawn at the Treasury Department, as I understand. I do not know whether the persons who drew it there considered the aspect of the case which is presented with so much force by the Senator from California and the Senator from Oregon. I would, however, ask the Senator from California what his views particularly are in reference to the clause that no jeweler, worker, or artificer in the precious metals shall use any of those metals until they shall first have been stamped.

Mr. McDougall. It strikes me that the Senator from California might leave that out.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to acting on one provision at a time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I want to hear his views about the necessity of it, if it is intended to reach anything. The Senator will notice that the reason I ask the question is that in that section of the bill which makes exceptions, the ninety-fifth section, there is an exception made of "bullion used in the manufacture of silver-ware, silver bullion rolled or prepared for platers' use exclusively." A duty is not laid upon that. As the Senator's amendment reads at present, unless the whole act is deferred until a particular time, every jeweler would be prohibited from using what he may have on hand already.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say in reply to the Senator that I propose that this part of the act shall go into effect sixty days after its passage.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does that apply to the whole section?

Mr. CONNESS. No, to this particular provision. The necessity of it I stated briefly. That would leave a considerable time for them to consume their supply. Gold is so easily obtained, and it is so valuable, that it is not kept idle for any length of time. There is no stock on hand kept by jewelers, because gold and silver have a standard value and are obtainable at any time. However, any additional provision that the Senator may suggest I shall probably have no objection to.

The Senator asks me what my purpose is. My purpose is fairly and honestly, if you are going to tax the product of the mines, to equalize the tax so as to have it apply to all the people alike; in other words, to obtain a tax upon the entire product. In the mining sections of this country, which are now very extensive, the manufacture of gold and silver into articles of ornament and use is carried on very largely, there being no incorporation of other metals with it, no filling it with spelter in the center, but the jewelry is made with a lavish hand; and a very large portion of the gold, if not required to be first stamped, being used in this way, would escape taxation. My purpose in this amendment, which was drawn up at my own suggestion at the Treasury Department, but somewhat incompletely, was that in adjusting and applying any taxation that Congress may see fit in its wisdom to apply to the gold and silver product of the country, it should be so arranged that the tax collector and the producer of the precious metals should never meet; in other words, to provide for the tax in as indirect a manner as possible, and to avoid the objectionableness of a direct tax to be attempted to be collected from the producers of the precious metals.

Senators will remember that nearly a generation, certainly half a generation, has passed away since the people of the United States began to be producers from the earth of gold and silver. During that time they have gone whither they might in search of those metals, and they have been unobstructed by the tax collector, or by the agents of the Government. Their habits are formed, and we cannot change them by any law we may pass here. The people, to whom any law that we may pass upon this subject will apply, are far removed from the centers of power, far removed from the coercive agencies of the Government, and any attempt to enforce a provision such as is contained on the 140th page of this bill would simply have one effect: it would offend the entire population of that country to such an extent as to affect their allegiance to the Government. I have no doubt of that. It would immediately be taken advantage of by persons indisposed toward our Government, and it would be suggested that it was the cost and price of this war; that the war was not only being conducted for illegitimate purposes and with illegitimate objects, but that here was one of its results.

Besides, it will be borne in mind by the chairman of the committee that no adequate provision is made in any part of the bill for the collection of the tax as proposed and passed by the House of Representatives. You simply pay your tax collectors and assessors what they are paid for collecting and assessing other taxes. You do not increase their number. The result would be that it would be simply impossible; the attempt would be as futile and as unprofitable as anything in the world to attempt to collect the tax under the provision contained in the bill. My object and purpose, if the Government are determined to tax gold and silver, is that they shall tax them in a manner that will be least objectionable to their producers, and therefore I suggested to the Treasury Department that the tax imposed, whatever it may be, should be imposed at the mints and assay offices of the United States, and at the private assay offices established throughout the mining country, licensing those offices, subjecting them to the surveillance of the officers of the Government, and there deducting the tax imposed. A small tax imposed, because the expenses of collection would in that way be small, would be profitable to the Government. My object in this provision relating to jewelers was to prevent the absorption of a very large amount of gold and silver from the circulation of the country into articles that are made for ornament and use of those metals, without paying a tax. If we subject one man who is a producer of gold to the payment of the tax, all men who produce it should be subjected alike to the payment of that tax.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator, I perceive, does not exactly understand the bearing of my question. I suppose that there is all over the country a very considerable amount of bullion which has been assayed that you cannot get any tax upon in the way we propose. Now, why should a jeweler, if he has a chance to purchase that bullion in the market and use it, be prohibited from doing so?

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to any provision that will exempt stock on hand, if you can identify it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see any way but to strike out the provision in regard to jewelers.

The time will come when there will be none in market but that which is stamped.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator is not correct in that. There is never a time when the native gold and silver are not obtainable in the market. They are obtainable, and under this amendment any person may buy them and convert them into articles of ornament or use. I have no objection that the provision referred to shall be stricken out, but I give the Senator from Maine notice that if it is stricken out a very large portion of these articles will escape taxation.

Mr. McDUGALL. I think, with the chairman of the committee, that this particular provision should be struck out. There is not so large an amount of the precious metals that go into manufactures in California, not as much by far as go into manufactures on this side, and then what does go into the manufactures of the country is assayed metal. They do not take the gold dust as it comes from the mines, nor do they take the gold as it comes from the mills, more or less amalgamated with quicksilver, and use it, but they wait until it has gone through the assay office and is pure gold, and then they alloy it according to the quality of the article they desire to prepare. It would be very difficult to apply this provision. Indeed, now our manufacturers go and get the silver dollars and half dollars and melt them down; they pick up old silver and melt it down and prepare it in due form.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask the honorable Senator whether there is any danger, in his judgment, that a jeweler, or manufacturer of gold, can take away the gold dust or the raw gold and go through the process?

Mr. McDUGALL. He must assay it as a matter of course, and then it becomes subject to taxation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Would it not cost him a great deal more than it would to purchase the assayed gold?

Mr. McDUGALL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NESMITH. A great deal of it is used about the mines that it is not necessary to assay; a very large quantity is used in making breast-pins, and those pieces are not assayed.

Mr. McDUGALL. But that amounts to a very small item. A man at the mines will take out a fancy piece and give it to his friend or make it into a breast-pin.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If we undertake to say that no jeweler after sixty days from the passage of this act shall use any gold except what is assayed, we apply a rule to him that we apply to nobody else; we say that he shall not use gold which is now on hand for his purposes.

Mr. McDUGALL. I do not think that is a necessary feature in the amendment proposed by the Senator from California; and there is another trouble about both these provisions. As has been evident from the commencement, the assessment of this tax is a difficult subject to legislate about. I suggest whether it is advisable to affix a penalty upon the exportation of anything that is in the form of merchandise. The provision of the Constitution has been interpreted at various times; and I am inclined to think it would affect the latter clause of the amendment. The provision of the Constitution is that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State." If a tax or duty cannot be levied on an article exported, can a fine or penalty going into the public Treasury, which will operate in the same way, be executed against a party who exports the product of a State?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see the difficulty. There is nothing in the Constitution that prevents Congress from prohibiting the exportation of any article that they choose to prohibit. The provision is that an export duty shall not be laid.

Mr. McDUGALL. I am not disposed to urge any such objection as that if the difficulty can be overcome so as to enable the miner to get the product of his labor to the assay office. I think that is the object to be gained.

Mr. CONNESS. The object of this provision, which it has been before suggested to me might be considered as trenching on our constitutional power, must be palpable and evident to every man. If you undertake to tax the mines, to tax the gold and silver product of the country at all, you must provide that that tax shall be imposed upon it in some particular form. Every variation from that policy carries you, as a means of obtaining the tax, down to the point where it is produced from the mine. It is very desirable to avoid the latter mode. To go then to the proposition that we have now before us, and tax it in its assayed form, seems to demand that you are at the same time to prohibit the exportation in any other form.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will state to the Senator that that suggestion merely occurred to me. I do not urge it as an objection.

Mr. CONNESS. I simply suggest that otherwise it would go out of the country unassayed, and you would get no tax.

Mr. McDUGALL. I would ask whether the chairman of the Committee on Finance has moved to strike out so much of the proposition as assesses a tax upon the manufactured article? Is there any understanding about that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have not made any motion in regard to it. I was inquiring as to its effect.

Mr. McDUGALL. I think that had better be left out.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, it is rather an anomalous position for me to place myself in in the Senate, as an advocate of a tax upon a portion of the people of the State I in part represent here; but I do feel devoted to filling the coffers of the Government. As suggested to me the other day by a Senator not now in his seat, I am for the Government emphatically; and, as I suggested before, if you are going to tax gold and silver, I see no reason why you should not tax it equally to all persons. There is no peculiar burden upon jewelers or workers in gold and silver if they are compelled to use the article that has been assayed and stamped; in other words, the article that has paid its tax. A Senator suggests to me that manufacturers in gold and silver are already required by another provision to pay a tax of five per cent.; but, sir, they impose that tax in every case upon the consumers of the articles; it is not paid by them at all. I do not feel that that is a burdensome tax. When I desire to use articles of ornament, I think I shall be willing to pay for them.

But it must be remembered that the tax, whatever we shall fix it at in this amendment after it shall be adopted, is not like a tax on any article manufactured. It is an absolute subdivision of the gold and silver itself. If we shall fix a quarter of one per cent. as the amount to be collected, it takes a quarter of one per cent. away that never returns. If it is to be one half of one per cent., it is one half of one per cent. separated from the whole mass. The same is true of whatever amount we shall impose. That tax then being a subdivision apportioning a certain portion of it to the Government, would fall equally upon all persons. There is no burden in compelling the jeweler to use the gold and silver that has been stamped and that has paid its tax. I think it is but just and fair that it should be done.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If this were a question of interest only to the gold-producing section of the country, I should not say one word upon it; but I regard it as one affecting the interests of every section of the country. I think it is very apparent to every reflecting man that the value of the currency of the country can only be maintained in two events: one is that we shall produce in the country in large quantities articles that have a foreign demand, and that shall restore the balance of trade in our favor; another is that we shall encourage the production of gold from the mines so as to supply in the channels of trade in the country that gold which is being taken away by two things: first, the extravagance of the country, and, secondly, the fact that the balance of trade is against us.

I cannot see the propriety in taxing the production of gold. I am against it entirely. With my present views on the subject I think it ought not to be taxed at all. I think the miner who furnishes to the country $100 in gold does a very substantial benefit to the Government as well as to the trading and producing community. I think we ought in every way to encourage the production of gold. With that view I supported not long since the bill proposed by the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. NESMITH], to facilitate the production of gold in Oregon and the Territories adjoining, by establishing a mint in that region of country. I was controlled in my vote upon that subject exclusively by this consideration. I supported the establishment of territorial governments out there, the establishment of law and courts, with a view to invite a population there; and we can even spare a portion of our population from agricultural labor if they will only go into the channels of producing gold and silver. But now, after we have adopted a policy like that, to turn around and tax gold even one per cent., seems to me to be against the true interest of the Government as well as the commercial interests of the country.

Mr. NESMITH. I fully concur in the very sensible remarks the Senator from Indiana has made on this subject, and I should long since have presented a protest against taxing the production of gold but for the fact that under the peculiar condition of affairs and the great demands upon the Treasury I presumed that that species of industry, the mining of gold, could not possibly escape some sort of tax. I should only assent to it under any circumstances by reason of the great pressure upon the Treasury in consequence of the war. The bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives proposed a tax of five per cent. That I regard as enormous, one to which the people would not readily submit. I believe it to be, however, the determination of Congress to levy some sort of a tax upon the production of the precious metals, and so believing I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from California, to make the proposition as palatable as possible to the people of my section of the country. I should very much prefer to have the mining interest encouraged and not taxed at all, if it were possible that Congress would consent to such an arrangement; but I apprehend from the condition in which the bill came to us from the other branch of Congress there is a settled determination to lay some sort of a tax on that production. I shall very readily concur in the sentiment of the Senator from Indiana, that there shall be no tax at all upon the production of the precious metals, and I believe that the country, as he has so forcibly stated, would be benefited by that policy. I assent to any tax only because it is beyond my power, as I apprehend, to resist it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see the slightest objection to putting this tax upon gold. The only difficulty heretofore has been in the way of reaching it. I do not think there is any mystery about it. It will go out of the country as long as the balance of trade is against us, whatever may be the quantity produced. I do not look upon the miner who produces $100 worth of gold as conferring any greater benefit upon the community than the farmer who produces one hundred bushels of corn. It is merely a product. One is money, and the other demands money.

Mr. CONNESS. You are treating them differently. You are not taxing one product as you do the other.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, we do.

There is another argument that applies to the production of gold. The Government own the mines. The Government will not sell them, and there should be some way in which they shall give a revenue from them. The great difficulty has been to find out how it could be done. People go there and mine as much as they please. Great ingenuity has been exerted to find out some way in which the Government shall derive some sort of revenue from the land which contains these mines. After great consideration, this mode is thought by Senators who represent the mining region of the country to be the best for the miner and the best to accomplish the purpose. I have no doubt the House of Representatives is fixed upon the idea that we are to have some revenue out of this product, and they take it in its manufactured state. I see no reason why it should not be just precisely as it is upon other products that go into the use of the country.

Mr. CONNESS. I agree very fully in most of the remarks made by the Senator from Indiana, but would suggest to him that that question is hardly involved now. The gentlemen from the Pacific slope, where gold is produced, are necessarily deeply concerned about this proposition, not (I will state to Senators here, though I need not state that) because they are unwilling to have their people taxed; but being more conscious of the difficulties that surround it and the uncertainty of mining as a profession and business, and knowing the burden that a very small tax apparently would be to those prosecuting enterprises in mining, these gentlemen, feeling the weight and responsibility of their position here and being duly sensible of it, have considered this question pretty thoroughly. The House of Representatives, I undertake to say, very hastily incorporated a very objectionable, impracticable, and unstatesmanlike provision in the bill as it came to us. A scheme is presented in lieu of that; but in that the amount of the tax is not fixed; it is left in blank. When this amendment shall be adopted in lieu of the one sent to the table by the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee, by a fair vote of the Senate we can fill up that blank and let the Senate determine how much that tax shall be. I do not feel disposed how to say anything upon that exact question until it shall come before us. I hope a vote will be taken on the substitution of the one form of amendment for the other.

Mr. CLARK. When a man goes upon his own land and digs a quantity of iron ore and takes it to the furnace and makes it into pig iron, you make him pay two dollars a ton for it; but if he goes upon the Government land, which the Government have reserved, and takes the Government gold, and has it assayed, then gentlemen object to his paying a very small per cent. I do not see why the man who takes the gold of the Government a fortiori should not pay a tax if you tax the man who takes his own ore and makes it into pig iron. In some respects iron is a very much more desirable and more important commodity than gold.

Mr. HOWE. But if we had a public statute fixing the price of the iron, could we put a tax of two per cent. on it?

Mr. CLARK. I do not know that I exactly understand the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly, if the interruption is not too long.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest to the honorable Senator that the reason why it would be a vastly greater burden to impose two per cent. or two dollars a ton or any amount upon gold than upon iron is found in this fact: that no matter what tax you put upon gold, whether it be little or much, it adds nothing to the value of the gold. The value of the gold is fixed. When you add two dollars a ton or ten dollars a ton to iron, it is made into railroad iron or some other form and that two dollars or ten dollars is charged to the consumer. That is the difference. You have but to repeat your tax of one per cent. or one half of one per cent. a sufficient number of times to consume the product of the gold entirely. Every time you affix a tax to an article like iron, that goes into all the manufactures of the country, you affix a tax upon the consumers of the articles that are made out of it.

Mr. CLARK. Let us look a little into this matter and see how it is. The man who digs the iron ore and manufactures it into pig iron depends upon what happens to be the market for that article when he gets through. Perhaps it will pay him for digging and manufacturing; perhaps it will not. He may be entirely ruined by his undertaking, if he has gone largely into it, by not finding a market. It is very true that if he manufactures that which he intended for iron into something else, and there is a demand for that, he may dispose of it in that way. But does not that apply to the manufacture of gold? Suppose a jeweler manufactures it into gold spoons or plate, and finds a market for it in that way. The miner of gold has this advantage: he has a uniform value for his gold when he has got it, and a miner of iron has not. The miner of iron is subject to much greater vicissitudes than the miner of gold, and the miner of gold in addition digs that gold out of the Government's own soil.

Mr. McDougall. I desire to make a single remark in reply to a suggestion made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and also by the Senator from New Hampshire, that this gold belongs to the Government, and is taken from the Government lands. The great evil in all the mining districts of the Sierra Nevada, of Oregon, and Colorado, is, that the Government has not made provision by which individuals may acquire the right in those lands and mines. Many of the wealthiest mining districts in California are now being abandoned because absolute rights to them cannot be acquired. The mines of the best character when discovered cannot secure foreign capital, because no fixed price can be ascertained. If a man is proprietor of a mining interest and he dies in California, there is only one chance in ten that his heirs or legatees can obtain any interest out of their results. And valuable mines have been abandoned, and are now unworked, because they cannot secure the proper capital. It is now some ten years ago since the mining interest of California, and some of the finest mines of California, the quartz mines, were ruled out of exchange in London, no man daring to present the stock for the want of a solid basis of right.

I suppose two thirds of the area of California is what is called mining land. Not an acre of it has been surveyed. It has not been laid off into sections; it has not been laid off into small parcels, so that individuals can acquire rights to it. They go upon it temporarily and perhaps put up cabins; they stay there as long as they can work with some special advantage; but it is only a place for a day, or a month, or a season, and then they wander off to other places; whereas if they could acquire permanent rights they would make their homes there; such land as was arable they would turn into gardens; they would employ labor, and it would be a benefit to the country.

It is not the fault of the people of California or of the enterprising miners that those are Government lands. They have had no opportunity to acquire a right to the lands. The State of California would be twice as strong and twice as populous to-day if at an early period provision had been made whereby persons seeking rights there could secure permanent and fixed interests. I hope to see the day, and that not long distant, when we shall have titles throughout California to all the property that is worth the purchase, and then the Government can assess its charges there as it does throughout other portions of the country. Then men will derive regular incomes from the property they possess. It is no fault of ours that the lands still belong to the Government. When they shall have been surveyed, and men shall have acquired rights to them, then mining will be pursued everywhere as a system, as a regular business, and property will descend from father to son, and the country will be developed in its mining as well as its agricultural interests. Much of that mining country is agricultural, but only here and there do you find a small garden. There are sections of country there that would sustain large farms and furnish large quantities of grain. It is no fault of the people of California or the people of the Pacific coast that this property is Government property. It would be much better for them to pay large prices to the Government and obtain a title which they could establish and maintain in the courts of the State and in the Federal courts.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to state, in reply to what was said by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, that upon all that portion of gold or silver that enters into manufactures, the bill provides a tax of five per cent. That is a very heavy tax on that portion of gold. But it will be remembered that gold and silver differ very much in that respect from iron, the larger portion of the gold and silver entering into coin, or the standard of value. That is not enhanced in value by being coined except to the extent that base metal is incorporated with it by provisions of law, and in no other way. We do not complain of the tax that is imposed, nor shall I complain, no matter how much it is, upon that portion of gold and silver that is manufactured. But, as I suggested before, the question of how much the tax shall be is not involved in the proposition as it is now before us. I hope the vote will be taken on the proposition now before the Senate, and then we can proceed to discuss the question of the amount of the tax.

Mr. DAVIS. The thoughts expressed by the Senator from New Hampshire were passing through my mind to some extent before he uttered them. The gold-producing States certainly render a great service, in the production of the precious metals, to the Government and to the people of the United States at large, and there is every disposition on the part of the Government, of Congress, and of the people to uphold and guard the interests of the mining States and of the people of the mining States. But this war and its vast expenditures constitute the reason and the necessity for the imposition of such enormous taxes. If one or two States in their products, in their great business, in their principal profits and income, are to have an immunity from the burden of taxation necessary to sustain the war, it seems to me it would operate prejudicially to the other States whose property and business are charged with the burden of sustaining the war. If you would free my own State, for instance, from the burden of taxation on the most of its property, the most of its annual income, or the product of its industry, it would be very slow in becoming wearied with this war, because it would be exempt very much from its burdens. I suppose it is so with California. I understand that the products of the mines average from fifty to a hundred million dollars annually. I do not know what may be the cost of mining, the cost of labor and machinery, and all the other expenditures of mining; but I presume it would be safe to conjecture that one half of the gross products of the mining operations would pay for all the labor.

Mr. CONNESS. Oh, no.

Mr. DAVIS. It is a matter that I know nothing about, and it is one that I feel very incompetent to act upon.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state to the honorable Senator that there is a memorial on the desk which perhaps states the facts as nearly as they can be approximately stated, which, when the amendment now pending shall be adopted, and the question comes up in relation to the amount of tax to be imposed, I shall call for the reading of. I think it states the case very clearly and succinctly.

Mr. DAVIS. If the amount of expenditure in mining is nearly equivalent to the gross product of the mining, I do not think it would be just or politic to tax the mining operations at all.

Mr. CONNESS. I think it is greater.

Mr. DAVIS. Then it is a little curious that the mining should be prosecuted with so much vigor and energy. I suppose, however, it is on the principle of a lottery.

But, sir, I was going to make this remark in connection with an idea thrown out by the Senator from New Hampshire. The mines belong to the United States. If one of those mines belonged to an individual and another individual was to obstruct upon that mine and extract gold from it by mining operations, the owner of the mine could recover the amount of the product of the mining operation from the trespasser without any allowance to him for the cost of mining. I suppose that the gold in the mines belongs to the United States. The nature and essence of the product of the mining is not materially changed after the mining operation is complete; that is, after the gold is taken from the mine. It may be purified in some instances; in others it is dug pure from the mine; but at any rate its essential essence is not changed, and consequently the product of the mining belongs to the owner of the mine. That is the general law. If that be so, the product of these mines belongs to the United States because the mines belong to the United States.

I do not say that I am in favor of imposing any tax upon the product of mining. My mind wants information and light upon that subject. But I want the whole people of the United States to be put in a position of equality so far as the burdens of the war are concerned. We are engaged in a great and expensive war, under the burdens of which my constituents are becoming wearied, and greatly wearied. Why? Because they have to sustain their proportion of the whole, and that proportion is becoming grievous to them. If the mining States are not subject to the same burden; if, on the contrary, their industry and the products and avails of that industry are exempt from these burdens in an undue degree, they occupy a condition which I think they ought not to occupy, because they are not made to bear their just portion of the burdens of this war.

Mr. President, the people of the United States are getting tired of this war. There is not a man in the United States but what would bring it to a close to-morrow if he could upon what he thought to be an honorable basis; not one. The idea that the immense flow and expenditure of blood and of treasure in this war should not produce revulsion and weariness in the hearts and minds of the people of the United States to the continuance of the war is a most absurd, preposterous, and untrue position. Every man would terminate the war to-day if he could upon what he would deem—

Mr. NESMITH. With great respect to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, I will state that that question is not now before the Senate. There is a blank in the amendment offered by the Senator from California, which is to be filled with the amount of tax which shall be assessed upon this mining interest, and when the amendment now before the Senate shall be adopted, if it should be adopted, that question will come up for discussion. On that subject I shall probably have something to say; and I shall be very glad to listen to the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, if he will consent to give way until action can be had on the amendment now pending, and then his argument will be legitimate enough on the question as to the amount to be placed in the blank.

Mr. DAVIS. I propose to conclude in a very few minutes what I have to say on this subject. It is not my purpose to say another word on this subject. I do not wish to be instrumental in acting any injustice to the miners or to the people or to the States of California and Oregon, nor will I do it knowingly. I am not prepared to vote at this time for or against this proposition. I want further light and information on the subject.

But, sir, when I was interrupted I was making one or two general remarks. I want the people of the United States, including the mining States as well as other States, to bear equally the burdens of this war, and I want them to become wearied with it, and desirous to terminate it pari passu, and I know that that disposition on the part of the people will be much more uniform if there is something like a uniformity of its burdens upon the people of all the States and of all the sections of the United States. I believe and I have no doubt that it is because this war is profitable to the manufacturing States, especially to those that manufacture the war material and the military stores that are necessary to carry on the war, it is because they find it profitable to their people and enriching to their States that they do not feel the same revulsion to the continuance of the war that the people of Kentucky and of the Northwest do. If I could devise a system of legislation I would make the burdens of this war operate with equal weight and impartially upon all the people. I would not have the gold of California or Oregon unduly exempt. I do not intimate that it is; I do not know that it is so; but I do believe from my conscience that the people of the manufacturing States do not meet their full and just proportion of the grievous burdens of this war; that is to say, their industry is of such a character, and is purchased to such an extent for the consumption of our armies by the Government of the United States, as to make the continuance of the war, which is so burdensome and impoverishing to others, profitable and enriching to them. If California and Oregon are in any degree favored in that way I should like to see that favoritism removed. I have no information on the subject whether it is so or not; but as the honorable Senator from California intimates to me that the expenses of mining in the aggregate exceed its profits, if my mind is left in doubt on that proposition, I would not vote to impose one cent of tax upon the mining operations or upon the miner.

I merely make these remarks for the purpose of eliciting facts and information. I want to vote understandingly, and I want to vote as wisely as I can in relation to this most important subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Oregon has suggested that the question which is now being discussed is not pertinent to the present debate, and the same suggestion was made by the Senator from California, who proposes this amendment. I am not able to see it as those Senators do. It is proposed by the amendment to tax gold at some rate. They say the amount is left in blank, and that is to be filled. If no tax is to be imposed, which would be my view, then the amendment is not required; nor is the original provision of the bill proper to be left in.

I understand that the gold is disposed of in three ways: first, a portion of the production of the mines is exported. It is conceded that we cannot tax that; that we cannot lay a duty on exports. I do not think we can evade that provision of the Constitution here by requiring gold to be stamped with a view to exportation. Another use of gold is to be manufactured into jewelry. That is already taxed, and I presume every Senator will concede that five per cent. is a very high tax. In addition to that, there is a tax upon the persons who use jewelry. Then the only remaining use that can be made of gold is the change of it into coin; and now it is proposed to tax that, to reach that question in considering this amendment. I cannot agree to it.

I do not think that the illustrations furnished by the able Senators from New Hampshire and Maine meet the objection that I attempted to present. The Senator from New Hampshire says that we tax the labor of the iron miner, and if it is right to tax him it is not also right to tax the laborer who produces gold and silver from mining? I have not looked at this question as a question between the Government and the miner. I have looked at it as a question affecting the commerce and the finances of the country. Gold regulates the value of the currency; iron does not.

The illustration furnished by the Senator from Maine was that if we tax the man who produces corn by the cultivation of the soil we should in like manner tax the man who digs the gold from the mine. Corn does not regulate the currency of the country or determine the value of the paper money, unless that corn becomes an export to foreign countries and brings into this country, in return, gold.

Mr. President, it has been said, and it is a beautiful expression, that he who made two blades of grass to grow where one had grown before was a public benefactor. In view of the condition of our currency, of our commerce, and of our Treasury, we may well say that he who produces $200 of gold where but $100 was produced before is a public benefactor and a patriot. Certainly one of the necessities of the Government is that the value of the paper currency shall be brought nearer to the value of gold. The distance between paper and gold is daily increasing; what it may become none of us can say. It is a matter of alarm to us all. Whether it is dependent upon the extravagance of the country or the folly of the Treasury Department, I do not choose now to discuss; but certainly it is our duty to adopt that policy which will give a greater value to the paper currency of the country; and that is done by increasing the gold in the country.

I am in favor of that policy which will encourage the miner to produce two dollars now where in past years he has produced but one. Let us add $100,000,000 a year, if we can, to the gold in the country. In former times it has not been the true interest of the country, in my judgment, to increase the gold of the country. It is not real wealth. It is not a real advantage to a people to have too much gold. But now we cannot have too much. The condition of our country demands an immense currency, hundreds of millions where but thousands were required before. The commerce and the business of the Army require it.

Then, sir, if to-day we find paper as compared with gold at 190, it certainly is the business of Senators to look to it how we shall bring the paper and the gold in value nearer together. I am in favor of everything on our part which shall encourage the production of gold and silver. Certainly for the Government and the commerce of the country it is a wise policy. That, sir, controls my vote against any tax whatever upon gold.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope we shall take a vote. We have already consumed an hour and a half on this question. If we go on at this rate we shall not get through with the bill by this time next year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California, as a substitute for the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before that question is taken, I move to fill the blank in the amendment that has just been adopted by inserting the word "one;" so that it will read:

On bullion in lump, ingot, bar, or otherwise, a duty of one per cent. ad valorem, to be paid by the assayer of the same, &c.

Mr. CONNESS. Will an amendment to that amendment be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER.) The Chair thinks it would.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Maine by inserting "one half of one" in lieu of "one" per cent, as proposed by him; and upon that I call for the reading of a memorial presented to this body and the House of Representatives by the Chamber of Commerce of the city of San Francisco; and also a very brief telegraphic dispatch that I hold in my hand, sent to me by one of the judges of Nevada Territory, who presided at a public meeting in Virginia City, in that Territory, on this subject of taxing the gross product of the mines. I will state, also, that I have in my possession a very extensive correspondence on this matter, both by telegraph and by letter. I shall not intrude it on the Senate, being only desirous to have as much read as will give Senators an opportunity to consider the subject upon which they are now to vote and the opinions of the people of that country in regard to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to state that in reply to an inquiry of the honorable Senator from California a moment ago, the Chair answered that an amendment to the amendment would be in order; but an amendment such as is moved by the Senator from California now, in the opinion of the Chair, would not be in order, because it requires all that was moved by way of amendment to be struck out. It leaves nothing for the amendment to the amendment to act upon. It will simply stand upon the ground of different sums named to fill a blank, and on that question the rule is to take the question upon the highest number first. Different numbers may be named, and the Chair will put the question upon the highest number first.

Mr. CONNESS. It will be in order afterwards to move the amendment I have suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly, after the highest number has been voted upon. Different numbers may be named. The Chair understands that "one" is the highest number named, and the question is upon inserting that number.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for the reading of the memorial in question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The papers offered by the Senator and whose reading is requested will be read, if no objection be made. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco hereby respectfully remonstrate against taxing the gross product of the mines in the Pacific States and Territories. The proposition for levying such a tax is regarded with surprise and alarm by the people of this coast, and we believe that it must be based on misconception of the situation and nature of our mines and of the character of mining enterprises. The mineral wealth of our mining districts has not been exaggerated, but the popular estimate of the profits of mining enterprise is excessive because the difficulties, risks, and expenses which are inseparable from them are not appreciated. Our most valuable mines and mineral lodes are found in the sterile mountains of the Sierra Nevada range, frequently far removed from wood or water, and accessible only by roads cut and hewn in the steep mountain sides. To develop them main shafts, drifts, and tunnels must be worked through solid rock, consuming months and often years of toil. Good ore is rarely found except at a considerable depth, and in most cases it is necessary to expend many thousands of dollars in the erection of steam machinery to keep the mine free from water. The lode, when reached at a great depth, may yield ore that is fabulously rich, or perhaps rebellious ore, that retains its treasure in defiance of the skill thus far attained by mining experts, or may be barren rock, which will compel the abandonment of the work. Mills containing ponderous and expensive machinery are indispensable to the reduction and treatment of ores, and in many instances the ores and the wood required for the mills are hauled from distant points by teams that consume provender which must be transported hundreds of miles by other teams. These present only a few of the difficulties incident to the business of mining, yet that people abroad seem unable to comprehend the facts that the bullion extracted from the depths of our mountains does not actually represent the amount of labor expended; that the entire production of most of our mines is consumed by the extraordinary expenses peculiar to working them, and that mining enterprises may afford employment and revenue to many thousands of men, support various branches of industry, sustain the prosperity of States, and augment the wealth of a nation, and still fail to remunerate those who project and control them, as science can detect the spot where a mine can be profitably opened, and no experience can predetermine the expense of such an undertaking.

Mining operations are from the beginning laborious, tedious, costly, and extremely precarious. Of this the countless number of abandoned shafts and tunnels, and the numerous others wherein the unrewarded labor of years is vigorously continued in the hope of ultimate success, afford the most conclusive evidence. Nothing but the liberal policy heretofore observed by Government respecting the working of mines could stimulate men to embark in such perilous enterprises. To that liberal policy may be justly attributed the peopling of vast Territories belonging to the national domain, the organization of new States, the building of towns and cities, the aggrandizement of commerce, and the actual production of metallic currency sufficient to preserve the vitality of our national finances during a period of unprecedented trials. We respectfully submit that the national benefits derived from these fruits surpass any results that could emanate from a less liberal policy. We further represent that the business of mining is the chief support of our industrial and commercial systems; that a tax on the gross products of mines would utterly crush and destroy the mining interests, and consequently involve us in general ruin; that it would give the foes of Government in our midst a strength and support that might produce critical results; that it would drive population, capital, and enterprise from the Pacific States and Territories to Mexico and British America, and divert commerce in the same direction; that instead of increasing the amount of national revenue desirable from this coast, it would inevitably at no distant day reduce it comparatively to an insignificant sum; that the mineral lodes recently discovered in our mountains are beyond the capacity of our present population to develop, and the business of mining, relatively considered, is yet in its infancy. The physical difficulty and peculiar points that now embarrass it are slowly yielding to the energy, enterprise, and experience of our people, who have been greatly encouraged by a few notable instances of success; and while we do not magnify the evil consequences that would result from the proposed taxation, we believe that under a continuance of the present liberal policy the business of mining would ultimately prove a grand success and confer incalculable benefits on the nation at large. In view of all the foregoing, we respectfully but earnestly remonstrate against the enactment of any law imposing a tax on the gross production of the mines.

By order of the Chamber:

JAS. DE FREMERY,
President.
C. ADOLPHE LOW,
First Vice President.
RADMOND GIBBONS,
Second Vice President.
WM. R. WADSWORTH,
Secretary.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 19, 1864.

Dated VIRGINIA CITY, May 10, 1864.

Received WASHINGTON, May 11, 1864.

To Hon. JOHN CONNESS:

Resolved, That loyal Nevada, desirous of contributing her energy to the support of the Government to crush out this unholy rebellion, does in mass meeting declare that the tax upon the gross proceeds of the mines is an onerous, unequal, and impolitic measure; and that such a law will have a direct and immediate tendency to stop the development of the mineral wealth of our Territory, and ruinously decrease the sources of revenue of the General Government.

Resolved, That while we are willing to pay an equitable and reasonable tax on all interests, and while we recognize the right of the Government in self-preservation to call upon us for our last man and our last dollar, yet humbly we represent that a tax by Congress upon the gross proceeds of our mines will be destructive to the general prosperity of our Territory, and especially at this period of limited development of our mines.

Resolved, That these resolutions be forwarded by telegraph to Hon. JOHN CONNESS, and to be by him respectfully submitted to the Senate of the United States.

L. D. S. TURNER, President.
G. R. JONES, Secretary.

Mr. CONNESS. I now call for the yeas and nays on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine to make the tax one per cent.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise to ask if this tax is one per cent. on the gross proceeds.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir, it is a tax on the gross proceeds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a very different tax from the one the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco remonstrate against.

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance says it is a different tax from the one they remonstrate against. They remonstrate directly against a tax on the gross proceeds. They do not remonstrate against the amount, but against the mode of the tax. They are willing to submit to a tax upon the net proceeds or a tax upon the profits of mining; but as that system is not pursued in any part of this bill, except in regard to the income tax, and as they are already subject to that, I have not asked that that system shall be resorted to here. The tax imposed at the mints and assay offices with the other provisions of this amendment will necessarily be a tax on every ounce produced as near as the law can compel it in the entire mining region.

Mr. HOWE. As the yeas and nays have been called on this question, I desire to say just two things. I shall vote against the tax of one per cent. because I prefer a tax of one half of one per cent. if there is to be any; but I shall vote against the tax of one half of one per cent. because I am opposed to any taxation upon this product. I believe, as the Senator from Indiana said a short time ago, that if there is no other product in the country, this is one which is the interest of the Government to encourage and not to discourage. This is unlike any other tax to be found in this bill; everything else, every other product that you impose a tax upon, you impose it with direct reference to its being paid, not by the producer, but by the consumer. It is so with coal; it is so with iron; it is so with copper; it is so with cloth; it is so with raw cotton; but with regard to gold and silver, it must be paid by the producer, and cannot be paid by anybody else, because the statute which you have yourselves enacted says that it is worth so much, and it never can be sold for any more than that. It is therefore unlike any other tax; and the most burdensome, the most discouraging tax that you impose upon any product, you impose upon that product which is the sternest necessity of the country at this time. I object to it.

It has been said in the course of this debate that you are the proprietors of all this wealth, and that you impose this tax by way of gathering some slight compensation for the use of your property. Sir, I wish to remark here that in truth you are not the owners of this wealth; you do not own these mines. Why? You may own the soil in which they are imbedded, you may own the mountains in which are buried this gold and this silver; but after all the Government does not possess them. You do nothing to develop them, you do nothing to ascertain the fact. What if Omnipotence can understand that there is buried underneath us to-day untold wealth in gold and silver and diamonds; you know nothing about it; you are not the possessors of it. In every block of marble lying outside in this yard there is I suppose a statue of almost incalculable value imbedded. Canova or somebody else might develop it; but until it is developed who shall say who is the owner of it? Is it the man who owns the block? Can he say that in truth he owns a statue? You do not own these mines. You know nothing about them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask my friend, to carry out his argument, whether, if I own a piece of marble and a man who has the power to make a statue out of it comes along, has he not a right to take it and use it without paying me anything?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of course; because he can develop it and I cannot.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly; that is the logic of the whole argument.

Mr. HOWE. I own my own logic and I propose to use that, as I consent the Senator shall use his own marble, just as we please respectively. [Laughter.] My logic does not go to any such extent. I do not insist on the right of these miners to go and take this gold at all. If you deem that the public interest will warrant you in saying so, say to them, "You shall not take it." If you prefer that it shall lie in the mines than that it shall be dug out of the mines, say so; but you do not say so; I do not say so. I say it is the first interest of the public—and I am legislating not for the miner, but for the public—to have this wealth developed and brought into the use of man, and therefore I do not vote for a law to prohibit mining; I do not vote for any enactment that shall discourage the development of this wealth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on filling the blank in the amendment with the word "one," and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Cowan, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Hadden, Harris, Morgan, Morrill, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wiley—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Foot, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sumner, Wilkinson, and Wilson—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Harding, Henderson, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, Richardson, Riddle, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, and Wright—10.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNESS. I move now to insert the words "one half of one" in the blank; so that it will read:

On bullion in lump, ingot, bar, or otherwise, a duty of one half of one per cent. ad valorem, to be paid by the assayer of the same, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The whole amendment having been previously agreed to, the amendment is now adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to strike out lines three hundred and forty-eight, three hundred and forty-nine, and three hundred and fifty, on page 140.

Mr. CONNESS. That is the tax proposed in the House bill upon the same subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The House imposed a tax of five per cent. on this same production, but the Senate seem to think that one per cent. is too much.

Mr. HOWE. Has this amendment been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has.

Mr. HOWE. I understood it was only adopted as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FOOT. They were independent propositions to fill the blank.

Mr. HOWE. I understood that the amendment of the Senator from California was offered as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was so.

Mr. HOWE. We adopted the amendment to the amendment. There was a blank in that to be filled. That blank has been filled, and the question is upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. FOOT. The Senator is wrong about it. They were taken as independent propositions to fill a blank which was according to the rule. The Chair was undoubtedly right. It could not have been entertained as an amendment to the amendment. They were separate and independent propositions to fill a blank.

Mr. HOWE. The Chair was entirely right about that and I do not controvert that at all; but I say this whole proposition was voted upon as an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe that is so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In reply to the suggestion, the Chair will state that the Chair was under the impression that the vote had been taken on the amendment as amended, but the Chair was mistaken; it was not so; the question has not been taken on the amendment as amended, and it is still a pending question. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now, sir, I move on page 140, section ninety-three, lines three hundred and forty-eight, three hundred and forty-nine, and three hundred and fifty, to strike out the following words:

On gold and silver produced from quartz mines, from beds of rivers, from the earth, or in any other way or manner, a duty of five per cent.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not the Senator mean to have any tax on gold?

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have got a tax of one half of one per cent. as the bill now stands with the amendment just adopted, only in a different form. It is on the bullion as assayed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Those lines go out, as a matter of course.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to strike out—

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will let me get through with some amendments I have to offer I shall be much obliged to him.

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 148, section ninety-five, lines fourteen and fifteen, I move to strike out the following words:

Bullion used in the manufacture of silver-ware, silver bullion rolled or prepared for plates' use exclusively.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 151, section ninety-eight, line fourteen, I move to strike out the word "sterling" and to insert "foreign" before the word "exchange."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 172, section one hundred and sixteen, line two, I move to strike out the word "other" before "national," so that it will read:

That in estimating the annual gains, profits, or income of any person, all national, State, and municipal taxes, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 46, at the end of section thirty-seven, I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That if any assessor or assistant assessor shall divulge to any party or make known in any manner, other than as provided in this act, the operations, style of work, or apparatus of such visited manufactory, said assessor or assistant assessor shall be subject to the penalties prescribed in section thirty-five of this act.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to hear what explanation the honorable Senator from Maine has to make of that amendment. It is rather an important one.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is one of the amendments which the Senator from Rhode Island gave notice he would offer. The object, as I understand it, is simply this: that if the assessor, in visiting a manufactory and making the examination which he is entitled by law to make, shall become familiar with any of the secrets of the manufacturing he shall not divulge them; that the person who is sent there by the Government to collect merely the tax, if that enables him to obtain possession of the secrets of their manufactory, shall not divulge what he may learn.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the honorable Senator mean to say that the power to punish that description of offense is one which we can properly exercise under the Constitution?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see why we should not.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think I can explain it to the Senator.

Mr. HOWARD. I see the justice and propriety of it, but the question with me is the question of power.

Mr. ANTHONY. There may be not merely processes of manufacture but styles of manufacture which vary every year. A calico printer, for instance, might very well afford to pay a large sum to an assessor to go into a rival establishment and come back and report the styles and colors and modes of fabric which he intends to introduce. It is necessary that the assessor should have access to the establishment, but certainly not that he should disclose what he sees either to the disadvantage of the manufacturer or printer.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I now desire to amend an amendment that we have already inserted in the bill. It is on page 170, section one hundred and fourteen, line ten, after the word "all" to insert the words "taxes on manufactures, manufacturing companies, and;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That all taxes on manufactures, manufacturing companies, and manufacturing corporations shall be assessed and the tax collected in the district within which the place of manufacture is located.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The word "manufacturing" where last used in that amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will not do any harm to repeat it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now, sir, I should like to take up the important provision in relation to banks and banking that was passed over.

Mr. CONNESS. Before that subject is taken up, as it will involve debate, I should like to offer one amendment, as I desire to leave the Chamber for a few moments. Does the Senator consent?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If it is a plain proposition that will give rise to no discussion I have no objection.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not think it will. I have no desire to discuss it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is it?

Mr. CONNESS. The tax on quicksilver.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That will give rise to discussion.

Mr. CONNESS. I think not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we had better go through with the amendments of the committee, and dispose of them.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move now to proceed to the consideration of section one hundred and nine, relating to banks and banking, on page 161.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That section is now before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offered an amendment the other day as a substitute for that section. I propose to amend my amendment in one or two particulars. I suppose I have the right to modify it. On page 3 of the amendment, line forty-nine, I propose to strike out "one fourth," and to insert "one fifth," so as to make the duty one fifth of one per cent. a month.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought the Senator proposed to insert "one sixth," so as to make it the same as it is in the original bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. At present I think I shall leave it at one fifth. In line eighty-one of my amendment, page 4, I propose to strike out the word "further" and to insert the word "additional;" and in line eighty-four, after the word "capital" I propose to insert the words "stock paid in."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendments reported by the Committee on Finance to this section one hundred and nine. The Senator from Ohio proposes to strike out the whole section and insert an amendment, in lieu of the committee's amendments, which he has sent to the desk and which has been printed. It will be, however, first in order, previous to taking the question on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to strike out the whole section and insert his amendment, first to perfect the section and the amendments reported to it by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. The ordinary parliamentary way is to perfect the original bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The amendments of the committee to that section have been adopted, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendments reported from the Committee on Finance to the section, which have not been taken up heretofore, but were passed over.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought they had been adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose it would be perfectly in order to strike out the original proposition and then amend the matter inserted in lieu of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us first take the question on adopting the amendments reported by the committee to the original section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be taken on the amendments reported by the committee by way of perfecting the section before the question is put on striking it out. The amendments will be read.

The first amendment was in the second line of the section, to strike out the word "eighth," and to insert the word "quarter;" so that it will read:

Sec. 109. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year upon the average amount of the deposits of money, subject to payment by check or draft, with any person, bank, association, or corporation engaged in the business of banking, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line six, after the word "banking," to insert the following words:

Other than associations organized and established under and by virtue of "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved February 25, 1863.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eleven, to strike out the word "also" and insert the word "and;" and in line twelve to strike out the word "its" before the word "capital;" and after the word "stock," in line thirteen, to insert "invested in such business beyond the amount invested in United States bonds;" so that it will read:

And a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year, as aforesaid, upon the average amount of capital stock invested in such business beyond the amount invested in United States bonds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-five, to insert the words "capital and" before the word "deposits."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-eight,

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 161.

to strike out the word "eighth" and to insert the word "quarter."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out in line forty of section one hundred and nine, the words "provided, that" and to insert "and," and in line forty-one after the word "corporation" to insert:

Other than associations organized and established under and by virtue of "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States stocks, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line forty-seven, to strike out "fourth" and insert "half," in line forty-eight, after "each" to strike out "month" and insert "half year," and after "the" to insert "average."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line forty-nine, after "obligations" to strike out "so issued by said person, bank, association, or corporation," and to insert "in circulation during the preceding half year;" and in line fifty-three, to strike out "each and every month" and insert "April and October of each year."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line sixty-nine, after "Monday" to strike out "in each and every month" and insert "of April and October of each year;" after "one" to strike out "fourth" and insert "half;" in line seventy-one, before "amount" to insert "average;" after "amount" to strike out "so returned" and insert "of its circulation as aforesaid;" so as to read:

And shall, within ten days from the first Monday of April and October of each year, pay to said collector the said duty of one half of one per cent. on the average amount of its circulation as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line seventy-five, after "of" to strike out "one" and insert "five," so as to make the penalty for neglecting to make return and payment five per cent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "provided," in line eighty-one, to strike out "further."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "liquidation," in line eighty-two, to insert:

Provided, also, That all banks, associations, corporations, or individuals, issuing notes or bills for circulation as currency, shall be liable to and pay the further duty of one and one half per cent. in each half year upon the average amount of such currency issued beyond the amount of ninety per cent. of its capital. In the case of banks with branches, the duty herein provided for shall be imposed upon the circulation of each branch, severally, and the amount of capital of each branch shall be considered to be the amount allotted to or used by such branch. And the additional duty herein provided for shall be collected and paid at the time and in the manner hereinbefore specified. And so much of an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863, as is inconsistent with this act is hereby repealed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish simply to say that that section is necessarily left imperfect because the national banks which are referred to are organized under two separate acts, and the act we propose to pass this year repeals the old one; therefore, on page 161, after the words "February 25, 1863," we shall have, when that act becomes a law, to insert it also.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bank bill does not repeal the old law, I think, but it modifies it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are organized under both acts.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And therefore we shall have to repeat both in this clause.

Mr. SHERMAN. That can be done at any stage of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We can leave it at present.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to make one or two suggestions about this provision before we pass the amendment. In the first place, beginning at the close of the amendment, I call the attention of the committee to the expression, "and so much of an act entitled 'An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government,' approved March 3, 1863, as is inconsistent with this act is hereby repealed." I understand this lays a different tax on banks from what that act did. That is not at all "inconsistent" with this act. Because one act imposes three per cent. on circulation, and another imposes three per cent. more, they are not inconsistent; the last act is cumulative, it adds so much. It seems to me that if that be so, (without a particular examination of the old statute,) this repealing clause should be qualified so as to read, "so much of the act, &c., approved March 3, 1863, as provides a tax or excise upon banks is hereby repealed." I take it the committee intended this tax on banks to be in lieu of all other taxes. If that is what they intended to do, this latter expression should be qualified in the way I have stated. I suggest to them whether it should not be so. Strike out the words "as is inconsistent with this act," and insert "as provides a tax or excise upon banks."

Mr. FESSENDEN. "As provides any other tax than as is herein imposed."

Mr. COLLAMER. Say "any tax."

Mr. FESSENDEN. "Any tax other than herein imposed."

Mr. COLLAMER. The law proposed to be repealed cannot provide for the tax "herein imposed." Why not say "which provides any tax upon banks," &c.? I propose to strike out the words "as is inconsistent with this act" and insert "which provides any tax or excise upon banks."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator to take this language: "so much of the act, &c., as imposes any tax on banks or their circulation other than is herein provided."

Mr. COLLAMER. I will state why I do not like that. Suppose I should find on looking at the other act that it put in exactly the same tax as this does; then it would make two taxes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is "other," though not different.

Mr. COLLAMER. "If it provides any tax on banks what is the objection to this amendment?"

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not like that language without looking more particularly at the act.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no wish to help the gentleman's bill if he does not want it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have asked you particularly.

Mr. COLLAMER. I ask the gentleman whether this very provision that I call attention to is not wrong.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see it necessarily, but I am disposed to yield to the judgment of the Senator; but I want to qualify his language a little.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not want the gentleman to yield to my judgment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let it read "as imposes any tax upon banks, their circulation, or deposits, other than is herein provided for."

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not like that language so well as the other, but if the Senator likes it better I will agree to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER.) Does the Chair understand the Senator from Vermont to consent to the modification of his amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine?

Mr. COLLAMER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out in line ninety-six "as is inconsistent with this act," and to insert "as imposes any tax on banks, their circulation, capital, or deposits other than is herein provided."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. COLLAMER. I propose in the seventy-second line of section one hundred and nine, on page 163, after the word "aforesaid" to insert "not including that in vault or on deposit for said bank." Gentlemen desire an explanation of this amendment. It arises from the peculiar wording of this section taken together. It is provided that the banks

Shall, on the first Monday of April and October of each year, make and deliver to the assessor of the district in which such bank, association, or corporation may be located, or in which such person may reside, a true and accurate return of the amount of notes, bills, or other obligations so issued—

That is with a view to taxation upon currency—whether in circulation or in its vaults, or elsewhere in possession or on deposit.

The bank is required to make a return of the amount of its notes, bills, and other obligations so issued "whether in circulation or in its vaults, or elsewhere in possession or on deposit."

And shall annex to every such return a declaration, with the oath or affirmation of such person, or of the president or cashier of such bank, association, or corporation, in such form and manner as may be directed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that the same contains a true and faithful statement of the amount of circulation as aforesaid; and shall deliver a copy of said return to the collector of the district in which said person resides, or in which the said bank, association or corporation is located; and shall, within ten days from the first Monday of April and October of each year, pay to said collector the said duty of one half of one per cent. on the average amount of its circulation as aforesaid.

That includes all in its own vaults or on deposit elsewhere, because that is required to be returned. Now, if you want a tax on circulation, I desire to provide that when they pay one per cent. on the average amount of circulation it shall not include that in vault or on deposit for the bank.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I will offer my amendment as a substitute for the section.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to amend that somewhat in the same way.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have adopted the last and put it in.

Mr. COLLAMER. But I think there is a misprint here. In the sixty-ninth line it reads now: "every month, pay to said collector the said duty of one fourth of one per cent."

The gentleman means one twenty-fourth, I suppose.

Mr. SHERMAN. No.

Mr. COLLAMER. The word "twenty" is omitted before "fourth."

Mr. SHERMAN. It was one fourth of one per cent. every month, amounting to three per cent. per annum. That I have changed to one fifth of one per cent. This is the tax on circulation, not the tax on deposits. In the forty-ninth line I have changed it; and it should be changed to correspond in this line.

Mr. COLLAMER. After the word "aforesaid," in line seventy-one of the amendment, I move to insert "not including that in vault, nor on deposit for the said bank."

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that is the meaning now; but I have no objection to the modification.

Mr. COLLAMER. The same change should be made in line eighty-three; after the word "currency" add "not including that in vault or on deposit for the said bank."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Ohio to accept these modifications of his amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; also at the end of line ninety-three I propose to strike out the words "inconsistent with this act" and insert the words already adopted to the section in the first amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, as amended; which will be read.

The amendment was read. It is to strike out all of section one hundred and nine, and to insert in lieu of it:

And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of the deposits of money, subject to payment by check or draft, with any person, bank, association, or corporation engaged in the business of banking, other than associations organized and established under and by virtue of "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved February 25, 1863; and a duty of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month, as aforesaid, upon the average amount of capital stock invested in such business, beyond the amount invested in United States bonds. And on the first Monday of every month of each year a true and accurate return of the amount of deposits and of capital, as aforesaid, shall be made and rendered to the assessor of the district in which such bank, association, or corporation may be located, or in which such person may reside, by all such persons, banks, associations, or corporations, with a declaration annexed thereto, and the oath or affirmation of such person, or of the president or cashier of such bank, association, or corporation, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that the same contains a true and faithful statement of the amount of capital and deposits as aforesaid; and shall also deliver a copy of said return to the collector of the district, and shall, within each and every month, pay to said collector the duty of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. on the amount of deposits, and of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. on the capital so returned. And for any neglect to make or render such return and payment as aforesaid, every such person, bank, association, or corporation shall be subject to and pay a penalty of $1,000, besides the additions, penalties, and forfeitures in other cases provided; and the amount of deposits and capital shall, in default of the proper return, be estimated by the assessor upon the best information he can obtain, and every such penalty, together with the duties as aforesaid, may be recovered for the use of the United States in any court of competent jurisdiction. And every person, and every bank, association, or corporation, other than associations organized and established under and by virtue of "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States stocks, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved —, issuing notes, bills, or obligations calculated or intended to circulate as money, shall pay a duty of one fifth of one per cent. each month on the average amount of such notes, bills, or obligations in circulation during the preceding month, or which, having been issued, shall remain in circulation; and shall, on the first Monday of each and every month, make and deliver to the assessor of the district in which such bank, association, or corporation may be located, or in which such person may reside, a true and accurate return of the amount of notes, bills, or other obligations so issued, whether in circulation or in its vaults, or elsewhere, in possession or on deposit, and shall annex to every such return a declaration, with the oath or affirmation of such person, or of the president or cashier of such bank, association, or corporation, in such form and manner as may be directed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that the same contains a true and faithful statement of the amount of circulation as aforesaid; and shall deliver a copy of said return to the collector of the district in which said person resides, or in which the said bank, association, or corporation is located; and shall, within ten days from the first Monday in each and every month, pay to said collector the said duty of one fifth of one per cent. on the average amount of its circulation as aforesaid, not including that in vault or on deposit for the said bank. And for any neglect to render or make such return and payment as aforesaid, every such person, bank, association, or corporation shall pay a penalty of one per cent. on the amount of notes, bills, or other obligations issued as aforesaid, which amount shall, in default of the proper return, be estimated by the assessor upon the best information he can obtain; and every such penalty may be recovered for the use of the United States in any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, that all banks, associations, corporations, or individuals issuing notes or bills for circulation as currency, shall be liable to and pay the additional duty of one third of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of such currency, not including that in vault or on deposit for the said bank, issued beyond the amount of ninety per cent. of its capital stock paid in. In the case of banks with branches, the duty herein provided for shall be imposed upon the circulation of each branch severally, and the amount of capital of each branch shall be considered to be the amount allotted to or used by such branch. And the additional duty herein provided for shall be collected and paid at the times and in the manner hereinbefore specified. And so much of an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863, as imposes any tax on banks, their circulation, capital, or deposits, other than is herein provided, is hereby repealed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state, as I desire a vote on this question, that the difference between the section of the bill as amended and my proposition is not very material. The first difference is that the tax I propose is a monthly tax, and it is desired more particularly to get a return of the circulation every month, the same kind of return as is provided for from the national banks, and it is desirable to have a return made monthly by all the banks of the United States, so as to show precisely at the beginning of each month the amount of circulating notes. The rate of tax is one fifth of one per cent. a month, and the aggregate, of course, two and two fifths per cent. per annum on the circulation not exceeding ninety per cent. of the capital stock. On all excess of circulation above ninety per cent. of capital stock the amendment proposed by me lays a monthly tax of one third of one per cent., equivalent to four per cent. per annum. The machinery is very nearly the same as is provided for in the original section.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand that the tax laid upon the circulation by the committee's section is two per cent. This is two and two fifths. Another thing, their tax on capital does not include that part of the capital which they have in United States bonds.

Mr. SHERMAN. Nor does mine:

A duty of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month, as aforesaid, upon the average amount of capital stock invested in such business beyond the amount invested in United States bonds.

On capital and deposits the tax is the same, except one is monthly and the other semi-annually.

Mr. COLLAMER. If I understand it aright there is two fifths of one per cent. more on the circulation by this amendment than by the committee's.

Mr. SHERMAN. On all within ninety per cent. of the capital stock.

Mr. COLLAMER. And this tax by the amendment is to be collected once a month and the other is collected only twice a year.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was not pleased with the proposition of the bill as amended by the Committee on Finance; but certainly I have greater objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio. The committee, I think, propose to make war upon the State banks and in favor of the system of national banks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The tax we propose is precisely the same as is imposed on the national banks.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not so understand it. I do not understand the bill correctly if that be so. I understand the bill of the committee to propose to tax one fourth of one per cent. upon deposits every six months, which will be one half per cent. upon deposits per annum.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is the same upon national banks.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will read it and see if I understand it correctly:

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year upon the average amount of the deposits of money, subject to payment by check or draft, with any person, bank, association, or corporation engaged in the business of banking, other than associations organized and established under and by virtue of "An act to provide a national currency," &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We did not put the tax on national banks here, because the same tax is imposed upon them by the act authorizing those banks. It is in the banking bill, and we did not want to put it on again in this bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is the reason why it was not inserted here?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir. This was drawn to correspond with that. We leave that bill to operate on the national banks, and this operates on the State banks.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I will ask the Senator whether upon the issues of the banks the same tax is laid. The tax upon capital stock is one half per cent. per annum, so far as that stock is not in Government bonds. I have no complaint to find with that. Then there is one half per cent. upon issues. That is the proposition of the committee, but that is not imposed upon the issues of the national banks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not in this bill?

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the other bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is what I desired to understand. Then the proposition of the Committee on Finance is to make the tax equal, except so far as the capital is invested in United States bonds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. To make it precisely the same in that respect.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Our State banks do not usually issue upon United States bonds, or very few of them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very true; but this is put in for the benefit of such State banks as do that. If they have invested in United States bonds they are to have the credit.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Some of our State banks do not give that kind of security, and do not bank on the United States bonds.

Now, I desire to speak of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, which I suppose is peculiarly the Treasury proposition, and is to carry out the idea that was expressed some time since in a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the difference between gold and paper in its value was owing to the inflation of the currency by State banks. I do not think the facts sustain the Secretary of the Treasury in that proposition; nor do I think he is authorized in making war upon State banks. I think there is nothing in the conduct of the State banks or the security which they have given to the public to justify the war which the Secretary of the Treasury makes on the State banks, nothing which would justify the support of that policy, I believe, by the Senator from Ohio.

I have not taken the pains to look into the condition of other State banks than those of the western States. The State Bank of Indiana furnishes a very much better currency than is furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is a currency that the people of Indiana and of the Northwest have a great deal more confidence in than in any of the issues of the Treasury Department. For more than a year and a half, I believe, in the course of my professional life I have not been able to be paid one dollar in the issues of the State Bank of Indiana. The people of the Northwest, when they have the issues of the State Bank of Indiana—and I believe the same is true in reference to the State Bank of Ohio—choose to keep them safely in their pockets; and if they have any of the currency furnished by the Treasury Department they prefer to pay that out.

Upon the question of fact made by the Secretary of the Treasury against the State banks, which statement of facts he supposes to justify him in making a war against the State institutions, I desire to speak of the history of the State Bank of Indiana. That bank, at the time of the passage of the law which authorized the issue of greenbacks, had a circulation of $5,800,000; she now has a circulation of $2,400,000—a reduction in her current circulation since the issue of the greenbacks of $3,400,000. It is proposed to make war upon her, to tax this circulation very unequally, with a view to force her circulation into her vaults again. She cannot get her currency. She can scarcely buy it. Some branches of the State Bank of Indiana within the last eighteen months have been paying, so as to withdraw their circulation, from one to five per cent., and in some cases ten per cent. has been paid to withdraw from circulation the issues of some of the branches of the State Bank of Indiana; and with all that she has only been able to withdraw her circulation $3,400,000, leaving $2,400,000 yet out. I see by a statement made by the president of the State Bank of Ohio that on the first Monday of April, 1862, the current circulation of that bank was $8,104,500; at the same time in 1863 it was $6,630,416; the same month in 1864 it was $5,512,685; showing a reduction from April, 1862, to April, 1864, of $2,591,815. I understand that the same is true in respect to the State Bank of Missouri.

Then, sir, these State banks have been endeavoring to reduce their currency within the last two years, but have been unable, because of the fact that the people will not pay it over the counters of the banks for the greenbacks. The people retain it in preference to the Government money.

Now, I ask the Senate, when these State banks have been laboring to reduce their circulation, when the allegation of the Secretary of the Treasury is not sustained in point of fact, that the State banks have been increasing their circulation, is it fair, is it right to make them pay an unequal tax upon a currency which they are unable to retire because of its better credit than the credit of the greenbacks? I say it is not fair; and no inequality of taxation ought to be imposed.

This statement is all that I desired to make on this question. I desired to show the condition of the State Bank of Indiana and of the State Bank of Ohio, and, so far as their statements show the facts, to prove that the allegation of the Secretary of the Treasury is not sustained, and therefore he is not justified in attempting to make war upon the State institutions.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that to-day the Senate take a recess from four and a half to seven o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Indiana will, I think, do me the credit to admit that what I propose to do in legislation I endeavor to do directly and without deception. I frankly admit to him that my purpose in this amendment is to make a discrimination against the State banks, and to compel them to withdraw their circulation. The tax which I propose on the circulation of local bank paper is two and two fifths per cent. per annum on the amount of circulation up to ninety per cent. on the capital stock; and four per cent. per annum on all circulation above ninety per cent. I must take this occasion to make some general observations in regard to our finances and of the currency.

No man of intelligence can reflect upon the present condition of public affairs, and especially the monetary affairs of this country, without feeling a sentiment of alarm. Every one will admit that the great evil of the times now is the inflation of paper money. I will not stop to inquire into the causes of this inflation, but every one can see on the surface of things that undue inflation of the currency of a country is one of the greatest evils that could befall it. It induces the hoarding of gold; but that is the least of the evils of inflation. It induces wild and reckless speculation. Men, seeing their neighbors make sudden profits by the depreciation of paper money, embark in the wildest speculations; become involved in debt; engage in enterprises that are far beyond their reach, and ruin is sure to follow. Inflation deranges all values, so that no man can tell what is the real value of the property he possesses; it may be very high to-day and very low to-morrow. This creates an excited condition of the public mind, so that people become in turn alarmed or elated, sometimes needlessly. The evils of the inflation of paper money have been so often depicted by historians in the experience of other nations that I will not stop to dwell on them.

What are the causes of this inflation? I say there are many. The great cause is the fact that we are in the midst of an expensive war. We are compelled to use an amount of money that no other nation in ancient or modern times has been able to use. The sums of money we are now appropriating and expending are far beyond any sums that have ever been expended before by any nation, even the wealthiest and the greatest. When this war broke out, the whole currency of the Government was gold and silver. Bank paper was only used as a medium of local exchange. The paper of the Bank of the State of Indiana, however good it may be, and I know it has always been well managed, and of the Bank of the State of Ohio would not pass current in New England or in New York or in any of the eastern States, although it was founded upon a gold basis, and every dollar of it when presented was redeemed in gold and silver. After all it was but a local currency which could not be disseminated and used all over the country. The paper of New England floated into the West, was paid out for our products, and finally came back to procure exchange; but the only national currency was gold and silver. When the war broke out gold and silver disappeared like magic. Coin disappeared in December, 1861, and from that time it has been considered simply an article of commerce; it has been demonetized. Why? Because of the state of war. This is one of the evils and incidents of war. Gold and silver coin is more timid than a woman, more timid than a child. In the midst of war it has always disappeared. The Government of the United States was compelled therefore to rely on paper money. For six months we carried on this war upon the basis of gold and silver. The banks now state that the Government broke them because it withdrew the gold and silver from their vaults and paid it out to the Army, spread it broadcast over the country, and they could not get it back into their vaults in time to pay it out again for their notes when they were presented. But that was the incident of war. We had to receive money, and in large sums, and to pay it out. Such is a consequence of war, and one of the most important consequences. The very need of large sums produces a scarcity of it and compels an enlargement of the volume of currency. If gold cannot be had rapidly enough, then in war either military supplies must be impressed by force or paper promises must be issued as a substitute.

The Government of the United States was compelled to resort to one of three expedients. It must make the State bank paper the medium of exchange as was done in the war of 1812, or it must issue its own paper, its credit, its notes, and circulate them as money, or it must throw on the market the bonds of the United States and receive for those bonds gold and silver coin. What course ought to have been adopted? Does the Senator from Indiana think the United States should have repealed the sub-Treasury law wisely put upon the statute-book by the Democratic party in its best days? Would he have recommended the repeal of the sub-Treasury law and the use of local bank paper for all the transactions of the Government? I think not, because, although he now seems to be very much attached to these local banks, he would scarcely have recommended a policy which would place the Government of the United States in the power and control of banks organized by thirty different States, over the extent of whose issues the Government of the United States had no control—banks organized on various bases; some founded upon stocks, like the banks of New York; some founded upon capital paid in, like the banks of New England; and some wildcat banks with no foundation at all.

It was manifest that the operations of this war could not be carried on upon the basis of the bank currency. What was to be done? Were we to sell the bonds of the United States and procure money in that way? This was tried for six months. Our seven-thirty bonds, bearing an interest in gold of seven and three tenths per cent., were thrown into the market and sold at a loss. Our six per cent. bonds, principal and interest payable in coin, redeemable at the end of twenty years, were sold at something like 92. Every man of sense knows that the effort to carry on the operations of this great war by the sale of the bonds of the United States would have glutted the markets of all the world. There was not gold enough in the United States, nor in the world, to carry on a war of this magnitude and form a circulating medium. If we had pursued that policy, a policy which no man recommended, we should soon have exhausted the supplies of gold. If we had thrown our bonds upon the market, the result would have been that they would now be scarcely worth what the French assignats were during the revolution in that country.

What else was left to us? We were compelled to resort to the issue of paper money. We did it, first limiting the amount of the issue to $200,000,000, then increasing it to $250,000,000, and finally reaching $400,000,000. There the Secretary of the Treasury determined to stop, and he told us in his annual report that he would not issue another dollar unless he was compelled to do so by the peremptory legislation of Congress, and that has been his position since.

Mr. President, it is one of the plainest and simplest laws of finance and of currency that you can only have a certain amount of circulating medium in the country. It may be difficult to fix the limit, but whenever that limit is reached, you cannot issue more; any attempt to issue more only destroys all values. Currency is to the nation precisely what blood is to the individual. It is the medium of exchange; it enlists the soldier; it feeds him, it clothes him, precisely as the blood conveys the nutriment from air, food, and water to support human life. Currency is like blood; the very moment a sufficiency is in the human frame to form a healthy circulation you dare not add to the quantity without producing disease and finally death. So it is with the currency of the country, whether it is gold or paper money. The United States had the right to issue its notes. It was the only course left. There was no way to conduct this war except by issuing them. Now the question comes up whether the bank notes issued by local corporations do not tend to embarrass and hinder the Government in the use of its clear power to borrow money and issue paper.

I will not go back to the argument which I presented to the Senate two years ago, in which I laid before them the authorities on this question, and showed that some of the framers of the Government, that such statesmen as Jefferson and Madison, and, to come later down, even the great Daniel Webster, expressed the opinion that the issue of State bank paper money was not within the purview of the Constitution; that paper money issued by a State bank was really a bill of credit issued by a State, and therefore prohibited by the Constitution. But waiving that question, I ask whether, when the Government is compelled to enter the arena and make a paper money currency, the supply of a similar currency by organized banks, chartered by thirty different States, does not tend to embarrass and destroy the power of the Government? The Government of the United States cannot regard the paper issued by State banks as money. Would the Senator from Indiana, I ask him now in all candor, vote for a law that would authorize the Government of the United States to pay out the notes of the banks of New England, New York, or of the other States? If so, he would abandon his favorite theory. I believe no one of us would be willing to do it, because, although some of those banks are substantial and well founded, we should not like to resort to paper not controlled by the Government and not depending on the security of the Government. He does not propose to do it.

Now, sir, what are the facts? We have four hundred millions of United States notes outstanding, and the State banks have one hundred and sixty-seven millions of their notes out. We have two hundred millions of legal-tender notes bearing interest, but which are only in circulation to a limited extent. Who does not know that this enormous volume of paper tends to embarrass all the operations of the Government, tends to raise the prices of all the provisions needed for the Government, tends to create extravagance and profligacy, and a wild spirit of speculation?

It is, therefore, the problem of the times; the most important thing Congress can do is to reduce even by arbitrary measures the volume of circulation. How shall it be done? I say in the first place that it ought to be done by compelling the State banks to withdraw their paper issues. In times of peace they did no harm. They merely filled the channels of local circulation. In times of war, however, these bank notes compete with the notes issued by the Government, necessarily issued by it, which it could not get along without, and they tend to swell the volume of currency beyond what is necessary. I say, then, and I proclaim it openly, that my purpose is not so much revenue as it is to retire the circulation of local bank paper with a view to the reduction of the currency.

Suppose we should now by a system of taxation, high taxation, if you please, compel the banks to pay their $167,000,000 of indebtedness to the people in the form of circulating notes, would not that reduce the currency? The withdrawal of that bank paper would do more to bring prices down to the old standard than any measure which could be proposed. Has not the Government the right to do this? Has it not the power to do it? I think it has, and I think it is its duty to do it. If I had my way I would levy on these banks as a tax the full amount of lawful interest on their circulating notes; and why?
